If the jurisdiction depended on law there could be no doubt. When a defender is by law subject to the jurisdiction of the Court at the date of citation the jurisdiction will continue whatever changes may take place. We are not however dealing with a jurisdiction of that kind, but with a jurisdiction which depends upon equity alone. I do not think that anyone can appeal to an equity when the reason on which it depends has ceased to exist, on the simple ground that he cannot use the equity for the purpose for which it was given. It is given in order that the two cases may be considered together—though in my opinion not necessarily with a view to a simultaneous decree. But when the final decree pronounced in the actio conventionis has been implemented, I see no principle on which the pursuer of the actio reconventionis can ask the Court to proceed with it. He is then suing what has come to be an entirely independent action. It aids no defence; for the defences to the previous action have been surrendered. It has not been brought to enable the Court to dispose of the claims of both parties in mutual actions; for if it is to proceed it must proceed alone. There is nothing on which the decree of the Court can operate; for the sum decerned for in the previous action has been paid to the creditor. Nothing remains to justify the Court in sustaining its jurisdiction except the fact that the respondents had been the first suitors—a reason which is in itself insufficient. In short, it seems to me that at the time when the appellant asked the Court to sustain its jurisdiction, the equity which could alone have justified the demand had ceased to exist, and that his motion was properly refused.

For those reasons I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff should be affirmed.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with the majority of your Lordships in holding that the Sheriff-substitute has erred, and that his judgment should be recalled.

We have, in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk in Thomson v. Whitehead, 24 D. 331, a very full and clear exposition of the grounds on which jurisdiction ex reconventionis is to be sustained, and all of the requirements necessary, according to that opinion (as I read it), to found such jurisdiction are to be found in the present case. The claim now made, as well as that which formed the subject of the actio conventionis, arise out of the same contract or transaction, and both cases were in dependence before the same Court at the same time,—that is to say, this action was brought into Court while the actio conventionis was still a depending process. The only point in which the present case can be said to be wanting in the requirements necessary for jurisdiction ex reconventionis is this—that looking to the state of the two processes, they could not have been terminated by a single sentence, or by two sentences, contemporaneous, or nearly contemporaneous. I leave out of view the fact that they could not be terminated by a single sentence, as that admittedly is not essential. It only remains to consider whether the two cases could have been terminated by sentences “contemporaneous or nearly contemporaneous.” It is obvious that here we have no hard and fast rule. The words “contemporaneous or nearly contemporaneous” admit of a certain latitude as regards time as well as some differences of opinion as to what time will fulfil the description thus given. It is unfortunate that the rule should be expressed in language vague enough to admit of considerable diversity of opinion as to its meaning and application. Does “nearly contemporaneous” mean that the two sentences must be pronounced within days, or weeks, or months of each other? Or does the contemporaneousness of the judgment in the second action depend on what actually takes place, or upon what might have taken place? In the case before us it appears that the judgment in the actio conventionis was pronounced on 31st July 1893, and the judgment appealed against was pronounced on 8th February 1894, the interval being a little more than six months. If the Sheriff, instead of allowing a proof as he did on an incidental question about the dissolution of the defenders' firm, had at once allowed a proof of the whole averments of parties, he might have been in a position to decide the case on its merits (assuming jurisdiction) within the same time; and if so, it would not be extravagant to say that judgments so pronounced within six months of each other were "nearly contemporaneous." Indeed, but for the fact that the vacation in the Sheriff Court commenced the day after the Sheriff's judgment in the actio conventionis, the decision in the reconvention could have been pronounced a month or perhaps two months sooner. But I cannot think that the matter of jurisdiction is to depend on the accident of a vacation, or upon the manner in which the Judge thinks right to deal with the case. I am not suggesting that in the present case there is the least room for finding fault with the Sheriff's mode of procedure. He was quite entitled to take the course he did. I am merely pointing out that a different course, if adopted, would have brought the two judgments considerably nearer each other in point of time. I can easily suppose circumstances under which the judgments in two actions like those we are now dealing with, arising out of the same transaction, depending before the same Judge, might not be decided within a much greater interval than six months, and where such interval could not possibly raise a doubt as to the jurisdiction. But if that is so, then the question of jurisdiction cannot depend on the circumstance of the time, greater or less, which intervenes in point of fact between the judgment in the one case and the judgment in the other. I venture to think that what is meant by the cases being terminable by judgments nearly contemporaneous is this—that there shall be nothing in the cases themselves which precludes them from being so determined, but that no account is to be taken of anything in the forms of process, the sittings of the Court, the orders of the Judge, or other accidental circumstance which may postpone the judgment in the one case longer than in the other. Viewed thus, I think the present case was one which might in ordinary course have been disposed of almost contemporaneously with the actio conventionis, and that in so far as the Sheriff has proceeded on the ground that the cases could not be so decided, he has erred.

But further, I think that the point of time when the question of jurisdiction or no jurisdiction is to be determined is the date when the actio reconventionis is brought. If there is jurisdiction then, the subsequent procedure in the case or cases will not destroy it. And, in my opinion, the only tests, at that date, of jurisdiction are (1) do the actions arise out of the same transaction, or are they ejusdem generis? (2) is the actio conventionis still in dependence? and (3) do the cases in themselves admit of being terminated by judgments nearly contemporaneous? If these questions are answered in the affirmative, there arises jurisdiction ex reconventionione; if otherwise, not. Applying these tests here, I think jurisdiction ex reconventionione was well founded.

I do not go into the other question disposed of by the Sheriff-substitute as to the constitution of the defenders' firm. I agree in what has been said on that subject by your Lordship in the chair.

ANDERSTON FOUNDRY COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Asher—Ure—Salvesen.

Reparation—Interest—Rate of interest.—A firm of shipbrokers contracted to supply tonnage to an iron company for the conveyance of 130,000 tons of iron sleepers from Middlesborough to the Argentine Republic, the iron company binding themselves to despatch for shipment 1000 tons of sleepers a-week, or 4000 to 5000 tons a-month. The iron company having ceased to despatch sleepers in implement of the contract after they had sent about half the total amount contracted for, the shipbrokers brought an action against them for damages for breach of contract.

The pursuers having been found entitled to damages, held (1) that the amount of damages was to be calculated on the footing of determining the amount of the loss for each month in which the defenders had tendered less than the stipulated quantity of iron; (2) (rev. judgment of Lord Low), that interest on the amount of each monthly loss, from the date at which the loss accrued, was to be included in the total damages due; and (3) that the rate of such interest was 5 per cent.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Low.

In February 1890 James Dunn & Company, shipbrokers, Glasgow, contracted with the Anderston Foundry Company, Limited, Glasgow, to provide the Anderston Foundry Company with tonnage for the conveyance of about 130,000 tons of cast-iron sleepers from Middlesborough to the Argentine Republic at 33s. 6d. per ton, the Anderston Foundry Company undertaking to despatch the sleepers at the rate of "not less than 1000 tons per week, which means shipment of 4000/5000 tons monthly."

In pursuance of this contract the Anderston Foundry Company despatched, and Dunn & Company provided shipping for, 60,648 tons of sleepers between the middle of March 1890 and the middle of May 1891, being at the average rate of 1000 tons a-week. Thereafter the parties respectively despatched and provided shipping for 1950 tons on 21st June, 1201 tons on 23d July, and 2800 tons on 19th August, all in 1891. The shipments in implement of the contract then ceased, the Anderston Foundry Company having despatched no further lots of sleepers for shipment. There had thus been shipped only 66,599 tons in all out of the total of 130,000 tons contracted for, leaving a balance of 63,400 tons.

In consequence Dunn & Company, in November 1892, brought an action against the Anderston Foundry Company, averring that since the date of the action the rate of freight had fallen greatly, and concluding for £65,000 as damages for breach of contract.

A variety of questions were thus raised between the parties, but the only one here to be reported was the following:—

The pursuers prepared a state shewing the amount of loss which they maintained that they had suffered each month in consequence of the stipulated monthly shipment of sleepers not having been made; and they further, in their total claim of £65,000, included interest at 5 per cent from the respective dates of these monthly losses.

The defenders, while they also prepared a state shewing the monthly amounts of damages to which they said the pursuers were entitled, on the assumption that the pursuers were entitled to damages (which the defenders denied), maintained that interest ought not to be allowed on these monthly amounts of damage, but only on the aggregate of them from the date of citation.

On 2d March 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interdictor:—"Decerns against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £40,285, 8s. 7d., with interest at 5 per cent per annum from 23d November 1892, the date of citation: Finds the defenders liable in expenses," &c.*

The defenders reclaimed.

The pursuers took advantage of the reclaiming note to maintain that the Lord Ordinary's judgment on the question of interest was erroneous. The arguments on this question sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk and the Lord Ordinary.¹

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—(After considering the other points in the case)—The last point is, whether the damages which the pursuers are entitled to recover are limited to the sums which fell due in each month of failure of the defenders to ship goods, as then ascertained, or whether in fixing the damage, interest on

* "OPINION.— . . . (3) The next question is that of interest. Both parties prepared the estimates of the amount of damages on which they relied upon the footing of ascertaining the loss sustained by the pursuers month by month upon the quantity of sleepers which ought to have been shipped during each month. I adopted the same method of assessing the damages, not only because I thought that it was a fair method, but because it was the only method suggested, or for which materials were furnished. The pursuers in their estimate calculate interest upon each month's loss in estimating the total amount of damages. . . .

"The pursuers contend that they are entitled to add the interest, because without it they would not recover the full amount which they have lost. The damages, they argued, being estimated upon the footing that they would have earned a certain sum in each month during the currency of the contract, their loss is not only that sum, but in addition what they have lost by not actually earning it at the time, or, in other words, by not having the use of the money which ex hypothesi they would have earned month by month.

"There seems to me to be a good deal of force in the pursuers' argument, but I think that the claim is a novelty in our law, and is not to be lightly admitted. Interest is due when there is a contract to that effect; in the case of bills it is provided for by statute, in the case of loans the obligation to pay interest has been long recognised, and interest will be awarded where payment of a sum which is due and of which payment has been demanded has been wrongfully refused. I think that that exhausts the classes of cases in which decree will be given for interest, and it is no novelty for a party to whom a sum of money is due not to be entitled to interest, as in the case of arrears of feu-duties or ground-annuals. Further, although claims for loss arising from breach of contract sustained a considerable period before the action was brought must frequently have occurred, no case could be cited in which interest upon the loss prior to the date of the action had been allowed. Therefore, although I do not say that cases might not occur in which a jury, or a Judge sitting as a jury, might competently award as damages interest upon loss sustained through breach of contract prior to the date of the action, yet I think that the circumstances of the case would require to be very exceptional in order to justify the adoption of such a course. Here there does not seem to me to be anything exceptional in the case, unless it be that the contract appears to have been unusually favourable to the pursuers, and consequently the amount of damages unusually large.

"I am therefore, upon the whole, of opinion that I ought not to allow the periodical interest which the pursuers claim. . . ."

money not paid at the contract time is to be put along with the contract sums, so as to make up the true sum of the damage suffered by the breach of contract. The Lord Ordinary holds that it is not, on the general ground that interest does not run on a claim of damages before the damage has been ascertained. That is a well-established principle, but the question is, does it apply to such a case as this, where money contracted to be paid at a particular time, and therefore due at that time, has not been paid, with the result that the contracting party has been kept out of his money and deprived of its use? Here if the defenders had fulfilled their contract, and paid the freights monthly for the rails shipped, the pursuers would have had the use of the money, and presumably—as is always presumed where money due is withheld—would have used it to profit. The defenders have broken their contract, withheld and retained in their own possession what the other party would have been paid as for debt but for their breach, and they must therefore make good that loss to those who have suffered by their breach. I hold that the monthly sums which would have been due under the contract, and the loss occasioned by their not being timely paid, put together, are the measure of the damage caused by the breach. To give to the pursuers both of these things is not, as I think, giving them damages and adding interest to the damages, but truly making up the damage they are proved to have suffered by non-fulfilment of their contract by the defenders. I therefore think that on this matter also effect should be given to the pursuers' contention by awarding to them such an amount of damages as will cover both the principal sums not paid and the additional amount they have lost through having not had the use of their money, which addition, although it can of course only be calculated in the form of interest, is truly an element of the actual damage sustained.

LORD YOUNG, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

Upon the question of the rate of interest the pursuers maintained that interest at 5 per cent should be allowed; the defenders that the rate should be 3 per cent.

LORD YOUNG.—I think that 4 per cent is enough.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The old rule certainly was 5 per cent, and I do not think it has yet been altered. It may, however, be worthy of reconsideration, looking to the fact that investments now earn so much less than they used to do.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think we must adhere to the old rule, and calculate the interest at the rate of 5 per cent.

LORD TRAYNER concurred with the Lord Justice-Clerk.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and decerned against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of a sum which included interest at 5 per cent on the monthly amounts of damages from the dates when the respective monthly damages accrued.

Reparation—Slander—Innuendo—Verbal injury—Issue.—A newspaper, commenting on the manner in which a contract for printing a register of voters had been secured, said—"This contract was secured by the lowest offerer in a mean and contemptible manner. We attach no blame to any of the burgh officials, but to the unfair advantage taken by the successful offerer to secure the contract." The successful offerer brought an action against the printer and publisher of the newspaper, in which he innuendoes the statement to mean that he had obtained the contract by dishonest and improper means. He also averred that the statement had been made with the design and the result of injuring him. The Court held that the statement would bear the innuendo put upon it, and allowed the pursuer an issue of slander, but that the pursuer was not entitled to an issue of verbal injury.

Paterson v. Welch, May 31, 1893, 20 R. 744, commented on.

THIS was an action of damages at the instance of John Waddell, 1st Division. printer and publisher, Alloa, against Andrew Roxburgh, printer and publisher in Tillicoultry and Alloa. Lord Kincairney.

The pursuer averred that he was printer and publisher of the Alloa Circular, a weekly newspaper, and that the defender was printer and publisher of the Alloa Weekly News and District Reporter; that in November 1893 the Tillicoultry Burgh Commissioners sent out circulars to the printers in Tillicoultry and Alloa inviting them to estimate for the printing of the register of voters for the burgh of Tillicoultry for a period of five years; that he had sent in a tender, and that his tender being the lowest had been accepted. He stated that for some time the defender had borne a groundless illwill at him, and then averred;—"In his said newspaper, the Alloa Weekly News and District Reporter of Wednesday, 20th December 1893, the defender inserted an article headed 'Burgh Commissioners,' and in a note to that article he stated,—'This contract was secured by the lowest offerer in a mean and contemptible manner. We attach no blame to any of the burgh officials, but to the unfair advantage taken by the successful offerer to secure the contract.—ED.'—meaning thereby that the pursuer had obtained the said contract by dishonest or fraudulent and improper means. . . . The statements and representations contained in said note were made and published by the defender falsely and maliciously to gratify his spite and illwill against the pursuer, and with the special design and object of injuring the pursuer in his trade, as well as in his feelings and reputation, and of exposing him to public contempt. The pursuer was the lowest and successful offerer in the contract above referred to, and the said statements by the defender are of and concerning the pursuer, and are false, malicious, and slanderous. The statements referred to have been read by a large number of people, . . . with the result that he has been injured in his feelings and reputation as well as in his trade and business as a printer and publisher."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender having printed and published the false, slanderous, and malicious statements and representations condescended on, of and concerning the pursuer, is liable in reparation as concluded for. (2) The statements and representations complained of being false, and having been made by the defender regarding the pursuer maliciously and with the design of injuring the pursuer, and the pursuer having thereby been injured in his trade and in his feelings and reputation, is entitled to reparation from the defender.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No relevant case.

No. 168.

Waddell v.
Roxburgh.

The pursuer proposed the following issues:—“(1) Whether the said statement was of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represented that the pursuer had obtained the said contract by dishonest and improper means, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? (2) Whether the said statement was of and concerning the pursuer, and whether the said statement was false, and was made and published by the defender with the design of injuring the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage?”

On 13th March 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) disallowed the issues, and assoilzied the defender.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The innuendo put on the words complained of was not so strained or extravagant as to disentitle the pursuer to the decision of a jury on it. The second issue was warranted by the case of Paterson v. Welch.¹ It might be that without amounting to slander, the words had so injured the pursuer that he had suffered patrimonial loss. Under the second issue he might recover damages for that, though not by way of solatium.

* OPINION.—This is an action of damages for defamation by the printer and publisher of an Alloa newspaper against the printer, publisher, and editor of another newspaper, also published in Alloa. The words complained of, published in the defender's newspaper, are these:—‘This contract was secured by the lowest offerer in a mean and contemptible manner. We attach no blame to any of the burgh officials, but to the unfair advantage taken by the successful offerer to secure the contract.’ The contract referred to was a contract for printing the register of voters for Tillicoultry, and the paragraph is said to refer to the pursuer. Two alternative issues have been tabled by the pursuer, the one appropriate to an action for slander, the other to an action for verbal injury.

“The first issue is whether the paragraph referred to represented that the pursuer had obtained the contract by dishonest and improper means. The question debated was whether the paragraph complained of could reasonably be innuendoeed as involving a charge of dishonesty. I have answered that question in the negative, although not without hesitation. The case is presented as a mere question of construction of the paragraph, and no circumstances are averred as colouring the paragraph, or as suggesting that the words meant more than their ordinary construction conveys. The idea of dishonesty involves some kind of fraud or falsehood perpetrated by misrepresentation, or concealment, or some sort of circumvention; but it is not suggested that the paragraph pointed at anything of that kind, and therefore it does not appear to me that according to its reasonable construction it can be held to involve a charge of dishonesty. The words ‘unfair advantage,’ read in connection with what precedes, seem to suggest some undue advantage taken by the pursuer which might be characterised as mean and contemptible, but not as fraudulent or dishonest.

“It was not maintained that the words, although objectionable and insulting, were defamatory without the innuendo.

“The alternative issue was proposed to meet the event of the paragraph being held not to be defamatory, and was said to be warranted by the recent case of Paterson v. Welch, 31st May 1893, 20 R. 744. The model of the issue in that case has not been followed exactly in the present case, but there would have been no difficulty in altering this issue so as to bring it into conformity with the issue in Paterson v. Welch. But I have disallowed the issue on other grounds, because I do not think that this is a case to which the judgment in the case of Paterson v. Welch applies, unless it applies to every false statement of which it is averred that it was made with a design to injure. I think that it cannot be reasonably suggested that the words complained of were used with any design to injure the pursuer, or to expose him to public hatred and contempt.”

The defender argued ;—The innuendo was too forced and unnatural to warrant the Court in sending it to a jury.¹ No suggestion of dishonesty could be read out of the words used.

No. 168.

June 9, 1894.
Waddell v.
Roxburgh.

The defender was not called upon to speak to the second issue.

LORD ADAM.—The Lord Ordinary has refused the first issue proposed by the pursuer, but he says that he has done so with hesitation, and Lord Kinnear observed in the course of the hearing that that in itself was enough to shew that there was a question which ought to go to a jury. I agree with that observation. In an action of slander the question of slander or no slander, libel or no libel, is always, prima facie, a question for the jury. Accordingly, if it is not quite clear that by no reasonable interpretation of this language could it be affirmed that there was a libel, we are not entitled to refuse to send the case to a jury. Here the averment of the pursuer just comes to this, that the defender said of him that he, the pursuer, took advantage of other persons in a mean and contemptible and unfair manner. If the innuendo which the pursuer puts upon the words in question were sent to a jury and they found for the pursuer, Mr Orr admitted that the defender could not ask for a new trial. That seems to me a conclusive test of the matter. I cannot say that the jury might not by reasonable construction of the words put the interpretation proposed upon them. I therefore think that the first issue must be allowed.

LORD M'LAREN.—It was pointed out from the bar, and is well recognised in practice, that a different and stricter standard of construction is to be applied to calumnious expressions affecting a person in his business relations from that applied to expressions used of the same person in his public capacity. We have discouraged actions of damages directed against public men for language used by them whether in the more important field of general politics or in regard to the administration of municipal affairs, or even of charitable societies. No doubt language used of a public man may be libellous, as, for instance, if one were to accuse a member of Parliament of having obtained his seat by bribery, but such accusations are rarely made, and, as has been often observed, there is practically no limit to the language that may be used in public controversy except that which is imposed by good taste and good feeling towards an opponent.

In the present case the kind of unfairness attributed to the pursuer is not specified, but point is given to the expression by reference to a particular contract, and that, I think, is sufficient to justify the innuendo that the kind of unfairness meant was dishonesty.

I agree, accordingly, that the first issue should be allowed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is a question for the jury whether the words of which the pursuer complains really impute dishonesty to him or not. I cannot say that it is impossible that they should bear the meaning which he seeks to put upon them. That is for the jury to determine. As to the alternative issue proposed for the pursuer, I have no hesitation in holding, and I understand your Lordships are of the same opinion, that if he is not entitled to the first issue he cannot obtain the second. It appears to me that the case of Paterson v. Welch has been somewhat misunderstood. It was

No. 168. not intended by the Court in that case to lay down that whenever the words of which a pursuer complains are not in themselves slanderous, he may have an issue whether they exposed him to public hatred and contempt. I understand that the opinion of the Lord President in that case proceeded on this, that the words which the pursuer in that action was said to have used of a class of persons were not slanderous of that class, but that, nevertheless, to impute to the pursuer that he had used these words was an actionable wrong, because he undertook to shew that they had been ascribed to him by the defender with the design of injuring him, and that he had in fact thereby been exposed to the public hatred and contempt. There were specific allegations of the special damage which had arisen to the pursuer from the words in question having been ascribed to him. I have no doubt that the form of issue adopted in that case was better calculated to bring the question fairly before the jury than the ordinary form of issue. Therefore I see no reason for dissenting from the judgment. It may be that to confine the use of the word slander to cases where the language complained of is obviously and on the face of it defamatory and injurious would be convenient, but I should rather have thought that all actionable words which are either injurious to the character or the credit of the person of whom they are spoken, or which expose the person with reference to whom they are uttered to public hatred and contempt, are defamatory or slanderous words. However that may be, I am of opinion that if the language of which the pursuer complains is calculated to expose him to public hatred and contempt, then it is slanderous language. If it is not calculated to expose him to public hatred or contempt, or to do him any injury,—if, when properly construed, it does not assail his character or credit,—then it is not slanderous or actionable at all. I have no doubt that the pursuer must have an issue of slander in ordinary form, or no issue at all.

LORD M'LAREN.—I desire to express my concurrence with what has been said by Lord Kinnear as to the case of Paterson v. Welch. I thought the case a narrow one at the time, and it certainly was not intended to give such an extension to the form of issue then allowed as is now claimed.

LORD ADAM.—I was one of the Judges in the case of Paterson v. Welch, and I concur in the observations made by Lord Kinnear upon it.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and approved the first issue proposed by the pursuer.

Ld. Kyllachy.

The pursuer also concluded for payment to him of £320 per annum from Whitsunday 1880 to Martinmas 1890, under deduction of payments to account, and thereafter of the sum of £400 per annum, or such other sum as should appear to the Court to be a "competent and legal stipend." The pursuer had since 1880 protested against the stipend offered by the defenders, and since 1884, owing to his refusal to give unqualified receipts, he had received no payments.

On 23d June 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced an interlocutor, in which he found that the defenders were bound to provide the pursuer and his successors "with a legal and competent stipend suited to the circumstances of the time and the position and duties of the benefice; therefore finds, declares, . . . in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons: Quoad ultra appoints the cause to be enrolled that parties may be heard as to the petitory conclusion."

The defenders reclaimed. The Second Division, on 16th March 1892, adhered.

On appeal the House of Lords, on 18th May 1893, affirmed this judgment.

The cause was then enrolled before the Lord Ordinary to dispose of the petitory conclusion.

On 8th July the Lord Ordinary appointed the pursuer "to lodge in process a statement of the stipend which he claims, and of the facts and circumstances on which he relies in support thereof, and that quam primum."

It is unnecessary to refer to the pursuer's minute and the defenders' answers thereto (lodged in obedience to the foregoing interlocutor) further than to say that the pursuer maintained that the stipend claimed by him was justified by a comparison with stipends paid to other parish ministers in Scotland holding cures similar to that of the Mid Parish of Greenock, and that the defenders maintained that looking to the fact that the pursuer had a manse, and to other considerations, the stipend should be fixed at £300 per annum.

On 2d February 1894 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer is entitled to stipend at the rate of £320 per annum, for the period from Martinmas 1880 to Whitsunday 1891, payable half-yearly at Whitsunday and Martinmas, and at the rate of £400 per annum thereafter, payable said stipend of £400 at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, beginning the first half-yearly payment as at the term of Martinmas 1891, and the next half-yearly payment at the term of Whitsunday 1892, and so forth, half-yearly and termly thereafter; but reserving the right of the pursuer and his successors in the cure to apply for an increase of stipend, in the event of the said stipend at the rate of £400 at any time ceasing to be a com-

No. 169. petent and legal stipend; and the right of the defenders and their successors in office to apply to have the stipend fixed at a less amount in the event of stipend at the foresaid rate at any time coming to be in excess of a competent and legal stipend, according to the circumstances of the time and the position and duties of the benefice: Finds that the pursuer is entitled to interest at the rate of 2 per centum per annum upon the balance in the hands of defenders, from time to time, of stipend accruing due to the pursuer during the said period from Martinmas 1880 to Whitsunday 1891, calculated at the foresaid rate of £320 per annum, payable half-yearly as aforesaid: Finds that the pursuer is entitled to interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum upon stipend accruing due to him from and after the term of Whitsunday 1891, at the rate of £400 per annum, payable half-yearly as aforesaid: Appoints the defenders to lodge in process an account shewing the amount due by them to the pursuer in accordance with the foregoing findings. . . .”

Peters v.
Magistrates of

Thereafter, on 21st February, the Lord Ordinary gave decree, giving effect to the foregoing interlocutor.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—If the Court were of opinion that the defenders were bound to pay the pursuer a larger sum than they maintained in their answers they were bound to give him, then the decree must have effect only from the date of the raising of the action. He was not entitled to receive arrears as from 1880, when it was admitted he had protested against the stipend offered.¹

Argued for the pursuer;—It was now ascertained that in 1880 the money value of the defenders' obligation was £320. They must pay the debt, for the pursuer had never discharged it.² The sum of £400 was in the existing circumstances not too high a stipend.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—Two questions were submitted to us under this reclaiming note, (1) whether the sum fixed by the Lord Ordinary as a legal and competent stipend was not excessive, and (2) whether in any view the defenders were liable to the pursuer in the stipend so fixed for any period anterior to the date of the summons.

On the first of these questions I see no reason for interfering with what the Lord Ordinary has done. The information laid before us as to the stipend paid to other parish clergymen in Scotland holding cures similar to that of the pursuer appears to justify the amount at which the pursuer's stipend has been fixed. With regard to the second question, I entertain no doubt that the pursuer is entitled to the decree pronounced in his favour. It is not disputed (at least cannot now be disputed) that the defenders were at Martinmas 1880 liable to provide the pursuer with a legal and competent stipend. That was their obligation then, although it was not then ascertained what in money value was the extent of the obligation. It is now ascertained that £320 a-year was the money value of the defenders' obligation at that date; and accordingly it is now ascertained that at Martinmas 1880 the defenders were bound to pay, and should have paid, the pursuer a yearly stipend of £320. That was their debt to the pursuer then; they have not paid it; they must pay it now. The delay on the part of the pursuer to bring this action to enforce his rights does not

Quarrier.

Minor and Pupil—Custody—Orphans—Minor's choice of residence—Brother's right to custody—Curator ad litem—Charity.—Two orphan children, a brother and sister, twelve years of age, were placed by their brother, thirty years of age, in a charitable institution, not Roman Catholic. Shortly afterwards he presented a petition to the Court to have them restored to his custody, averring that they were not being brought up in the Roman Catholic faith, which he alleged to be that of their father, and that the children themselves wished to be removed. He also averred that he had arranged for their being suitably brought up in a Roman Catholic institution, and that he was "willing, should the Court require it, to retain them under his own care or under the care of a relative." Answers were lodged for the manager of the institution. The Court, in order to ascertain the actual facts in the interests of the children, before answer, appointed a curator ad litem (diss. Lord M'Laren, who was of opinion that the sole ground of the application was the objection to the religious education of the children, and that such an objection when taken by a brother, who was not maintaining them, was not a relevant ground for the Court interfering).

ON 18th May 1894 James Morrison, brushmaker, Dundee, presented a 1st Division. petition to the Court to interdict William Quarrier, manager of the Orphan Homes of Scotland, Bridge of Weir, Renfrewshire, from removing from the jurisdiction of the Court the petitioner's brother and sister, Alexander and Margaret Morrison, and thereafter to ordain him to deliver the children into the custody of the petitioner.

He averred that he was thirty years of age, and that Alexander and Margaret, who were twins, were twelve years of age; that on the death of their father in October 1893, the survivor of their parents, the children had lived with the petitioner; that on a threat of prosecution by the officer of the School Board for neglecting the education of the children he had placed them in an institution known as the Orphan Homes of Scotland on 26th February 1894, organised and carried on by the respondent. He further averred that the parents of the children had been of the Roman Catholic faith, and that the children had themselves been baptised and brought up in that faith.

"The said children are not being retained in the Roman Catholic faith, in which they were baptised and brought up, and the petitioner is anxious, for that and other reasons, to have them removed from the custody of Mr William Quarrier and restored to himself. The petitioner has made arrangements to have them educated and maintained in a Roman Catholic institution, and he is willing, should your Lordships require it, to retain them under his own care or under the care of a relative, who has signified her desire to have them. The said children desire to be restored to the petitioner's care, but the said William

Morrison v.
Quarrier.

"The petitioner believes and avers that unless immediate interdict is granted against Mr William Quarrier he will remove said children out of your Lordships' jurisdiction and send them abroad."

The Court granted interdict, and answers were thereafter lodged by Mr Quarrier.

The respondent stated that he had first heard of the children from Mr Shepherd, the president of the Children's Free Breakfast Mission, Dundee, on 10th January 1894, and that he had received them into the Homes in the following circumstances:—"On or about 24th January 1894 the petitioner presented himself at the respondent's Homes in Glasgow, along with the two children and a letter of introduction from Mr Shepherd.

"The terms upon which the respondent was willing to receive the children were explained to the petitioner, and he then and there signed the usual printed form which the respondent is in the habit of getting signed by persons leaving children with him. The form is in these terms:—

"ORPHAN HOMES OF SCOTLAND AND DESTITUTE CHILDREN'S EMIGRATION "HOMES.

"Form of Agreement.

"I, James Morrison, make application to have my brother and sister Alexander and Margaret (twins), aged eleven and eleven years, received into the above-named Homes, with the view of being emigrated to Canada, under the care of William Quarrier or his agents, or to be kept at home, or otherwise disposed of as Mr Quarrier thinks best, in proof whereof I affix my signature." (Signed) "JAMES MORRISON.

"J. JAMIESON, witness.

"Glasgow, 24th January 1894.

"Nothing was said at this interview about the children or their parents being Roman Catholics. On the contrary, the respondent understood that they were Protestants. Whether they were Protestants or Roman Catholics would not have affected the respondent's willingness to receive the children, the Homes being entirely unsectarian, although the respondent is himself a Protestant."

The respondent heard no more of the matter until the 22d February 1894, when he received through Mr Shepherd a letter from the petitioner addressed to Mr Shepherd in which he, inter alia, said,—“If through you I could get the two of them in Mr Quarrier's Home, I would most heartily hand the two of them over to Mr Quarrier, on all his conditions, for good and all. I will be exceedingly obliged to you and happy if you could get them the chance they had before.”

Thereafter, on 24th February 1894, the petitioner presented himself at the Homes with the children. “He explained that he and all the other relatives of the children were now quite satisfied to leave them in the respondent's Homes, and they were left accordingly.”

The respondent further stated that in the end of April 1894 endeavours had been made to recover the children from the respondent by the Society of St Vincent de Paul; that the Society's agent had stated that a Mr and Mrs Brown were willing to adopt the children; that the respondent had made inquiries, and had satisfied himself that it would not be for the interests of the children to allow them to leave the Homes. He further stated,—“The girl is no longer in pupillarity, and has already, in connection with Mr and Mrs Brown's proposal, stated her preference for remaining in the Homes. The respondent does not at present, and never did, contemplate emigrating the children to Canada." No. 170.

Argued for the petitioner;—As the brother and nearest male agnate of the children, the petitioner had an undoubted title to present the petition. He was their natural guardian, and though not able to support them in his own home, he had made arrangements for their education and upbringing. The respondent, on the other hand, being an utter stranger to the children, had absolutely no legal right to their custody. It was an accident that they were in his Homes, and the petitioner's averment was that they were anxious to be restored to his charge. Except under the petitioner's control, there was no guarantee that they would be brought up in the religion of their parents, and in which they themselves had been baptized.¹

Morrison v.
Quarrier.

Argued for the respondent;—The petitioner had no title to present the application. He was not the tutor of the children. At anyrate, he had no absolute right to their custody. The girl being a minor pubes was entitled to select her own residence,² and the fact was that she was unwilling to leave the Homes. If that were so, the Court would not separate the brother and sister. Besides, the interests of the children were the paramount consideration,³ and it was not suggested that they were not well cared for in the Homes. On the question of religion, there was nothing to shew a sincere preference on the part of the parents of the children, even assuming their wishes to be a relevant consideration. It was really, however, for the Court, having regard to the welfare of the children, to say what their religion should be.⁴ The petition, therefore, should be dismissed, or otherwise, the course adopted in Flannigan's case² should be followed, and a curator ad litem appointed to ascertain the facts.

LORD ADAM.—This is a petition presented by James Morrison to have restored to him the custody of two children, who are his brother and sister, and are twins. They are just over twelve years of age, and the girl is thus above pupillarity, while the boy is still a pupil. The position of matters, as I understand, is this: These two children, after the death of their father and mother, were left in the hands of their elder brother, the petitioner. Although he had no legal title to their control, he very naturally and properly assumed the care of them, and as acting for them he handed them over to a Mr Quarrier, who, it seems, has certain Homes which he keeps for children who are not properly provided for—that was in February last.

Now, I cannot say that I altogether like the form which Mr Quarrier requires to be signed, and which he obtained on this occasion. It is in these terms:—"I, James Morrison, make application to have my brother and sister . . . received into the above-named Homes, with the view of being emigrated to Canada, under the care of William Quarrier or his agents, or to be kept at home, or otherwise disposed of as Mr Quarrier thinks best, . . ." and it is signed by the petitioner. Under that writing a very absolute power is supposed to be given to Mr Quarrier, but however that may be, the petitioner has now seen reason, as he supposes, to change his mind, and wishes the children removed from the custody of Mr Quarrier. What he says in the petition is this, that the children are Roman Catholics, and that he has ascertained that they are not being brought up in the Roman Catholic faith, and then he goes on to say,—

“The said children are not being retained in the Roman Catholic faith, in which they were baptised and brought up, and the petitioner is anxious, for that and other reasons, to have them removed from the custody of Mr William Quarrier and restored to himself. The petitioner has made arrangements to have them educated and maintained in a Roman Catholic institution, and he is willing, should your Lordships require it, to retain them under his own care or under the care of a relative, who has signified her desire to have them. The said children desire to be restored to the petitioner's care, but the said William Quarrier refuses to hand said children over to the petitioner, although repeatedly requested to do so. The petitioner believes and avers that unless immediate interdict is granted against Mr William Quarrier he will remove said children out of your Lordships' jurisdiction and send them abroad.”
Now, the averments might, and perhaps ought, to have been much more specific. The Court ought to have had more information as to the position of the petitioner and his relative, and also as to the Roman Catholic institution to which he refers. But the question is now before us, and we have to deal with it as it stands. As to the title of the brother to present the petition I have no doubt whatever. He is the nearest male agnate of the children, and has quite a right, when they are not being looked after by anyone else, to intervene on their behalf. On the other hand, I am equally clear that he has no power of control over these children. He is not entitled to say, “I have a right to dispose of these children.” In these circumstances it is for us to do what seems best. My only difficulty is this: Of Mr Quarrier's Homes I know nothing, of Mrs Brown I know nothing, and of the Roman Catholic institution to which the petitioner referred I know nothing. It therefore occurs to my mind that it is our duty to inform ourselves in the matter. The proper course to follow is that followed in a recent case, being to appoint a person in whom we have confidence as curator ad litem to meet with these children and to inform us what in the interests of his wards it is advisable for us to have before us in dealing with the custody and control of these children. I cannot say that the mere accident of their being in the hands of a perfect stranger gives him a right to bring them up. Taking into consideration the wishes of the brother and the other members of the family on the one hand, and those of Mr Quarrier on the other, I would not hesitate to say—other things being equal—that the wishes of the family should prevail. But we know nothing of how the facts stand. On the one hand it is said that the children are able to express their own mind, and that they wish to leave Mr Quarrier's Home. On the other, that they wish to remain. But we are not bound to yield to the desire of the children if we do not otherwise approve of it. It is our duty, I think, in the whole circumstances, to appoint a curator ad litem for the purposes I have indicated.

LORD M'LAREN.—Under ordinary circumstances I should not have thought it necessary to make a formal dissent from such a step as the appointment of a curator ad litem, which of course leaves the decision on the merits quite open. But it seems to me that in the present case an important point of principle is involved, and as I am of opinion that no relevant statements are made in the petition calling for the interference of the Court, I do not think that it would be fair to the parties to withhold at this stage the expression of my view, which is, that the petition should be dismissed. I do not entertain, and I do not suppose that any of your Lordships entertain, the idea that this Court has any general supervision or duty with reference to the upbringing and education of the poor children of the country. It is only when an application is presented to us on proper grounds that we can interfere, and it is necessary, in my opinion, that, in view of our intervention even to the extent of ordering inquiry, a prima facie case must be set out in the petition. I do not propose to consider the statements made in the answers, though it is undoubtedly consistent with our practice in disposing of summary applications to look at the statements made by the respondent. The case, to my mind, is so clear that, without looking at the answers, it is apparent that the petitioner has no right to the claim which he makes for the removal of the children from Mr Quarrier's Home. If it had been said that the children were being ill-used in this school or home, then, although unable to provide for them, the petitioner might still have an interest to apply to the Court, and in such a case I should think it might be the duty of the Court to inquire, because the Court might at least make an order to have the children removed to the poorhouse, where they would be maintained. Or again, if the petitioner, being a relative—and I do not know that in a matter of this kind a brother is in a better position than an uncle or other near relative—if the petitioner had come forward and said that though not legally bound to support his brother and sister, yet from motives of duty or affection he wished to maintain them in his own house, I should have given the most favourable consideration to such a petition. But the petitioner makes no complaint against the charity which is maintaining these children, and does not profess the ability or desire to bring up the children himself. He asks us to order the removal of the children from the school where they are at present being well cared for, and to put them in some other institution not designed, except that it is Roman Catholic; and the only ground upon which he asks this order is that he is a Roman Catholic, and that he wishes the children also to be brought up as Roman Catholics. Now, I cannot entertain the doctrine that a brother is entitled to impose his religious opinions on a brother or sister whom he is not maintaining, or that he is entitled, on the ground of difference of religious opinion, to insist on the children being removed from a charitable institution to another institution of the same kind. I agree with the observations quoted from a recent case, that where the question is between a charity and relatives who are willing to maintain the child, or between one relative and another relative, the religious opinions of the parents or of the family may be an element. But no question of that sort is here raised.

I may say that, like your Lordship in the chair, I have no knowledge of the institution called Quarrier's Homes, but that is not necessary, for there is no complaint against the Home, and in the absence of any complaint, I assume that the children are comfortably maintained according to their station in life. My opinion therefore is that the petition should be dismissed, and that it is not necessary that a curator should be appointed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair that a curator must be appointed for the purpose of enabling us to determine whether the children should be left where they are at present or should be given up to Morrison v. Quarrier.

No. 170. the petitioner. I think with both your Lordships that the petitioner's statement of the reasons for which he seeks the removal of the children is extremely unsatisfactory. The reasons are very vague and indefinite. But still I am not prepared to throw out the petition at once. The petitioner, though not the tutor-at-law of the children, is in the popular sense their natural guardian. He is the eldest brother, being thirty years of age, and these children are twelve years of age, both their father and mother being dead. It was the obvious duty of an elder brother to look after these two young children, and he says that he did so. His statement comes to this, that as the best way open to him of doing his duty to the children, he put them into the custody of Mr Quarrier. Now, it is true that the petitioner is not entitled as matter of right to demand the custody of these children. But Mr Quarrier is just as little entitled as matter of right to insist upon retaining them in his custody. The petitioner now says that he thinks that he has made a mistake in handing them over to Mr Quarrier, and he wishes them restored to him. He says that they are not being brought up in the faith in which they were baptised and brought up until their father's death, and in the second place, that the children themselves desire to be restored to his (the petitioner's) care, but that Mr Quarrier refuses to hand them over. These are the only specific statements or grounds alleged, and I think they are such as to justify inquiry, though I do not say that either or both would be conclusive if there were strong grounds the other way. Then the petitioner says that he has made arrangements to have the children educated and brought up in a Roman Catholic institution, and for that purpose he is to keep them in his own house or the house of a relative. Now, these averments are very vague, but there is enough to necessitate inquiry, and to make us appoint a curator, who may see the children and ascertain how they are being maintained at present. That we have a discretion, and therefore a duty in the matter, I have no doubt whatever. But we do not know the facts with reference to which our discretion must be exercised.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT, before answer, appointed Mr Bremner P. Lee, advocate, to be curator ad litem to the children, and allowed him to see the process.

The pursuer appealed.

At the commencement of the argument Lord Young pointed out that the Sheriff had failed to pronounce findings in fact as required by the Act of Sederunt of 15th February 1851, and his Lordship expressed the opinion that the case should be remitted to the Sheriff in order that he might correct his interlocutor.

Counsel for the defender admitted that the undernoted cases¹ appeared to make that course imperative, but contended that in the recent case of Caird v. Sime,² where, under the Judicature Act, 1850, the Second Division ought to have inserted in their interlocutor a finding upon a certain matter of fact, the House of Lords had, in order to save the delay and expense of a remit to have the interlocutor corrected, and with the consent of both parties, permitted the hearing of the appeal on the merits, the views of the majority of the Court upon the matter of fact being clear from the opinions. That would seem to indicate that the Court was entitled, both parties consenting, to hear the appeal as if the interlocutor was correct in point of form, the Sheriff's opinions being shewn in his note.*

THE COURT (LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD TRAYNER) pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect the Sheriff, in the interlocutor complained of, has failed to comply with the provisions of the Act of Sederunt of 15th February 1851, remit to the Sheriff to recall the said interlocutor, and to pronounce an interlocutor on the defender's appeal against the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute in the form prescribed by the Act of Sederunt."

Police—Private improvement assessment—Abortive assessment—Reparation—Action of damages against collector—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 106.—An action by the Police Commissioners of a burgh against a ratepayer of the burgh for recovery of a private improvement assessment imposed by them was dismissed on the ground that the ratepayer had not received notice of the imposition of the assessment at least two weeks before the day fixed for the hearing of appeals, as required by section 106 of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862. The Commissioners then raised an action against their collector for payment of the amount of the assessment, averring that their failure to recover the assessment had occurred through his neglect to send the notice within the statutory time.

The Court dismissed the action, holding that the pursuers had not proved loss through the defender's fault, in respect that it had not been determined whether the sum sued for might not still be recovered from the ratepayer by re-imposing the assessment and giving him timeous notice under the statute.

Lanarkshire.

IN January 1893 the Police Commissioners of Glasgow raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Thomas Donald, house-factor, 83 Renfield Street there, for payment of £28, 0s. 5d.

The pursuers averred that on 14th June 1892 they, as in right of the Police Commissioners of Govanhill, under the City of Glasgow Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. cxxx.), brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against David Sommerville, 34 Calder Street, for payment of £28, 0s. 5d., being the amount of a private improvement assessment imposed on Sommerville, on 13th October 1891, by the Police Commissioners of Govanhill under the powers of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, as his proportion of the cost incurred by the Commissioners in the improvement of Calder Street; that on 22d September 1892 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) dismissed that action in respect that Sommerville had not received notice of the imposition and allocation of the assessment upon him at least two weeks before the day fixed by the Commissioners for the hearing of appeals, as required by section 106 of the General Police Act, 1862*; that the defender was at the time of the imposition of the assessment the collector of the burgh of Govanhill; that as such it was his duty to give due notice, as required by the statute, to Sommerville, of the imposition of the said private improvement assessment; that in breach of his duty as collector the defender failed to give such notice to Sommerville within the time required by the statute; and that in consequence of the defender's said failure in duty the pursuers had been held not entitled to recover the said sum of £28, 0s. 5d. from Sommerville.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The defender having culpably neglected and failed to discharge duties imposed on him by statute, should be held liable in the consequences of such failure or neglect. (3) The pursuers having suffered loss to the extent sued for in consequence of the defender's culpable failure or neglect of his statutory duty, are entitled to decree, as craved.

The defender averred that the loss, if any, sustained by the pursuers had not been caused by any negligence on the part of the defender, but was occasioned by the fault of the clerk to the Police Commissioners of Govanhill in not giving the defender due intimation of the resolution of the Commissioners imposing the assessment, and fixing the day for hearing appeals.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The action is irrelevant. (7) Any loss sustained by pursuers not having been occasioned by or through the negligence of the defender, he ought to be assoilzied.

A proof was allowed. It was proved that the defender was not present at the meeting of the Commissioners at which the assessment was imposed, but there was a conflict of evidence as to whether the clerk to the Commissioners who was present at that meeting had duly instructed the defender to serve the notices.

* The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101), section 106, enacted,—“The said rates or assessments may be imposed and levied yearly, half-yearly, or at such other periods as the Commissioners may think fit, and shall be payable at such times as they appoint; and at the meeting imposing the same the Commissioners shall appoint a day on which such rates or assessments shall be payable, and another day on which appeals by any parties complaining that they have been improperly rated or assessed may be lodged with the clerk or collector, and another day or days on which appeals in reference to such rates or assessments shall be heard by the Commissioners; and notice to each party intended to be so rated or assessed, stating the particulars of the intended rate or assessment as regards such party, and specifying the several days fixed by the Commissioners as aforesaid shall be sent by the clerk or collector through the post-office at least two weeks preceding the day which may be fixed for hearing the appeal of such party. . . .”

On 8th January 1894 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, for the reasons stated in the note, that the pursuers have not proved that they have suffered loss through the fault of the defender as condescended on: Therefore assoilzies the defender."*

On appeal, the Sheriff (Berry) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that in October 1891 the defender was collector of the burgh of Govanhill, which has since been annexed to the city of Glasgow, and that in the said month of October he failed in his duty as such collector by omitting, notwithstanding instructions received from the Burgh Commissioners, to issue to one David Sommerville a notice of a private improvement assessment in sufficient time in accordance with the provisions of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101: Finds that the pursuers, as succeeding to the rights of the said Commissioners in terms of the City of Glasgow Act, 1891, have sustained loss through, and in consequence of, the defender's said failure in duty, and that the loss they have so sustained is the sum of £28, 0s. 5d., the amount of said assessment, which, through the defender's failure to give the statutory notice, is not now recoverable from the said David Sommerville: Therefore . . . recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Finds the defender liable in damages to the pursuers to the said amount of £28, 0s. 5d., for which decerns against the defender."

The defender appealed, and argued;—Under the 106th section of the Act of 1862, the notice was to be sent to the person assessed by the

* "NOTE.— . . . The failure to give such notice was, it is now averred, due to the negligence or error of the present defender, who was employed by the Commissioners to collect their rates and assessments, and also to issue the requisite notices. There is a question which is not, I think, very clear upon the evidence, whether he was properly qualified and duly instructed by his employers or their clerk, and whether the issuing of the notices was not properly a duty of the clerk. It does appear that it was naturally within the clerk's province, if not to send out the notices, at least to make sure that they were dispatched by the collector, who was not a lawyer, so as to meet the requirements of the Act, but I should have at least some difficulty in holding that Mr Donald was not duly instructed in this matter by the clerk.

"The case rather presents itself to me in this way. An action of damages cannot succeed, unless the pursuer clearly shews that he has suffered a loss by the fault of the defender. In this case it is not established beyond doubt that the pursuers are unable still to recover their private improvement expenditure from Mr Sommerville, the proper debtor. They have been defeated in an action against him, on the ground that the money which they sued for as private improvement assessment had not been duly imposed upon him as such an assessment, but it is not yet established that it is totally irrecoverable as against him. So far as appears—and I have heard a second and full argument on the point—it is still in the power of the pursuers, who are vested with every right and power possessed by the Commissioners of Govanhill, to allocate and impose the assessment anew, and to allow Sommerville an opportunity of appealing against it, under new notices duly issued. I do not know that there is any decision directly to the effect that this may be done, but it is suggested by the Lord Chancellor (Hatherley) at the end of his opinion in Campbell v. Leith Police Commissioners, Feb. 28, 1870, 8 Macph. (H. L.) 39, and no reason has been stated at the bar why inept proceedings, upon which this charge against the defender is founded, should be a bar in the way of another and regular allocation and notice. Unless this is made clear by the pursuers I am unable to find that they have sustained the loss which they seek to make good. . . ."

No. 172. "clerk or the collector." It was the natural duty of the former, for he always attended the meetings, and in the present case it was proved that the collector was not present at the meeting on the 13th October. Even assuming that culpable neglect of duty was proved against the defender, the action was premature, for it had not yet been determined that the pursuers had suffered loss to the extent sued for. Sommerville was still liable to pay the assessment, and the pursuers were quite entitled to impose the assessment anew, and allow him an opportunity of appealing against it under new notices duly issued.¹ The owner of the property assessed and the Commissioners were respectively debtor and creditor for the assessment as soon as the expenses were incurred in executing the works.²

Argued for the pursuers;—They had no power to re-impose the assessment, and even if they had the defender was proved to have neglected his duty, and was liable in the loss which resulted.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case relates to a private improvement assessment, which is the name given by the statute to a determination of the amount of expenses incurred by the authority in doing certain work which an individual ratepayer was bound to do and has failed to do. The statute provides that when the amount of these expenses is ascertained they may be charged as being a private improvement assessment. The object of that is plain. It is to enable the summary machinery of the statute for recovering assessments to be applied for the recovery of such expenses.

The facts are that in this case determination was given of the amount, and notice was given after that determination of the date on which an appeal might be stated; and the time for that appeal was fixed, but by some misfortune sufficient notice, viz., a fortnight, was not given to the party assessed of the sitting of the Court of Appeal. Accordingly he objected to pay the assessment on the ground that he did not get sufficient notice of an opportunity for stating an appeal. When an action was raised against him that action was unsuccessful on that ground.

The Commissioners have now raised an action of damages against the officer who they say should have given the proper notice of a fortnight before the day of assessment. They say that they have suffered loss and damage to the extent of the amount of that assessment which would have been paid by Mr Sommerville, but was not paid in respect of his not having got that notice. But we have no evidence before us that they have suffered any such loss. They have not taken any steps for recovering that money from Mr Sommerville except those which were based upon the bad notice. It was stated in the course of the argument that if in consequence of an insufficient notice the assessment cannot be recovered under an original levy, the Commissioners would still have power to fix a proper date for an appeal upon the assessment, and also that the assessment which is made upon a particular individual constitutes a debt due by him. In this case it is plainly a debt due by him turned into an assessment for the convenience of recovery. Is it to be said that he will be relieved of his obligation to pay simply from the fact that there has been some blot in the proceedings which prevents it being recovered under the first notice? That question has never been brought up, and has never been decided. When the Commissioners were asked what they had to say about it they said, "We are quite willing to hand over our right to press that plea to this defender." But that is not a ground for holding that any damages have been established by the evidence which is before us. Therefore on these grounds I think the general result at which the Sheriff-substitute arrived was right, although I think he erred in the case in assoilzieing the defender, because that would have practically precluded an action upon similar grounds relative to the same subject. It may turn out that they cannot recover this amount. If that were so, they may have a right to recover it from their collector as damages. Therefore, while adhering to the practical decision at which the Sheriff-substitute arrived, we confine ourselves simply to dismissing the action.

Police Commissioners v.
Donald.

LORD YOUNG.—I do not think that there is any practical distinction between dismissing an action such as this, and assoilzieing the defender from its conclusions. But on the case itself my opinion is entirely with the Sheriff-substitute, and against the views upon which the Sheriff has proceeded. The case is based really upon these words of clause 106 of the General Police Act,—“And notice to each party intended to be so rated or assessed, stating the particulars of the intended rate or assessment as regards such party, and specifying the several days fixed by the Commissioners as aforesaid, shall be sent by the clerk or collector through the post-office at least two weeks preceding the day which may be fixed for hearing the appeal of such party.”

The Sheriff-substitute says,—“There is a question which is not, I think, very clear upon the evidence, whether he (the collector) was properly qualified and duly instructed by his employers, or their clerk, and whether the issuing of the notices was not properly a duty of the clerk. It does appear that it was naturally within the clerk's province if not to send out the notices, at least to make sure that they were despatched by the collector, who was not a lawyer, so as to meet the requirements of the Act, but I should have at least some difficulty in holding that Mr Donald was not duly instructed in this matter by the clerk.” I also think that the evidence is doubtful upon this point, and although, with the Sheriff-substitute, I should not have been prepared to find that Mr Donald was not instructed, I am not prepared upon the evidence to affirm that he was. Not being at the meeting, he was not to know when the assessment was imposed and the appeal day appointed, but the clerk was, and there is a conflict of evidence as to whether the clerk duly instructed the collector to send the notice through the post-office, and unless we are able to affirm the proposition that the collector was properly instructed, there would be an end to the case entirely upon that ground, and I, for my part, am not prepared to affirm that proposition.

But irrespective of that, I agree with the Sheriff-substitute in holding that on the assumption that the collector was bound to issue notices fourteen days before the day appointed for the appeal, and was duly instructed to issue them, and that he failed, there is no case stated and no case proved that any damage arose to the Commissioners or their constituents in consequence. I think it is abundantly plain that if a party to whom an assessment applies declines to pay upon the ground that he has not got notice fourteen days before the day appointed for hearing an appeal, the proper remedy, which is quite competent

No. 172. under the Act of Parliament, is to give him notice again fourteen days before a day appointed to hear his appeal. But I do not know that it is necessary for us to decide that here, or that we could decide it effectually as in a question with Mr Sommerville, Mr Sommerville not being present and not being a party to this case.

June 12, 1894.
Glasgow
Police Commissioners v.
Donald.

But unless we determine that the assessment is lost for all time in respect that the defender's failure to give notice was an irremediable slip, the case of damage relied upon by the pursuers fails. For it may be, for anything that we can decide in this case in Mr Sommerville's absence, that the assessment is recoverable, and that the only damage occasioned to anybody will be the damage to the Commissioners, or as many of them as are necessary to form a quorum, meeting upon another day upon which to hear this appeal. That may be no stateable damage at all. My impression is, as I have already indicated, that if Mr Sommerville was here, and we could determine the question, I should be inclined, for my part, to hold that he was still liable for the assessment, although he was entitled to have fourteen days' notice of a day appointed for hearing his appeal, if he chose to lodge one. In his absence we cannot certainly make affirmative findings which will affirm that.

Whatever may be the proper form of findings, I am quite prepared for my part to revert to the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, holding that this action cannot be sustained.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of opinion that this action is premature, as it has not yet been determined that the assessment cannot be recovered, and I should prefer that it should be simply dismissed.

LORD TRAYNER.—This action of damages is based upon the statement of a plea for the pursuers that they have suffered loss to the extent sued for through the defender's fault. I think the alleged fact upon which the action is based is not substantiated, and that the pursuers have not proved that they have suffered any damage through the act of the collector. Upon that ground I am for dismissing the action.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find that it has not yet been determined whether the sum of £28, 0s. 5d. sued for cannot still be imposed as a private improvement assessment on Donald Sommerville, and recovered by the pursuers from him, and that the pursuers have not as yet proved that any loss has been sustained by them through fault on the part of the defender: Therefore sustain the appeal, and recall the interlocutor appealed against, as also the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 8th January 1894: Dismiss the action, and decern."

Crofter—Nature of right in holding—Property—March Fence—Crofters Holdings Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 29)—Act 1661, c. 41.—Held that a crofter within the meaning of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, is the tenant, not the proprietor, of his holding, and that, therefore, he has no title to insist, under the Act 1661, c. 41,* upon the proprietor of lands adjoining his croft paying half the cost of the march fence. No. 173.

MacDonald v.
Dalgleish.

In August 1893 James MacDonald and three others, crofters in Plocaig, Ardnamurchan, raised an action in the Sheriff Court, Oban, against James and Alan Cameron, farmers, Glendryen, Ardnamurchan, and John James Dalgleish, Esq., of Ardnamurchan, jointly and severally, or severally, to have the defenders ordained "to unite with the pursuers in erecting a march fence or dyke between the common pasture of the township of Plocaig and the farm of Glendryen on the estate of Ardnamurchan, and that to the extent of one-half thereof," and failing the defenders complying with the above prayer, for warrant to the pursuers to erect the said march fence, and for an order on the defenders "to pay to the pursuers one-half of the cost thereof."

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Argyllshire.

The pursuers averred that they were crofters within the meaning of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, and occupied their holdings under the defender John James Dalgleish, and that the other defenders were tenants of the farm of Glendryen under Mr Dalgleish.

They further averred;—(Cond. 2) "The said farm of Glendryen marches with the common pasture of the township of Plocaig, but there is no march fence." (Cond. 3) "In consequence thereof the cattle, both of the pursuers and the defenders, stray into each other's territory and cause mutual damage." (Cond. 4) "It is therefore necessary in the interests of all the parties that a march fence or dyke should be erected between the said farm and township, and the defenders are jointly and severally, or severally, liable to the extent of one-half of the expense of erecting such a fence or dyke. The pursuers, as crofters foresaid, are heritors within the meaning of the Statutes 1661, c. 41, and 1685, c. 39, and as such are entitled to insist upon the concurrence of the defenders as craved in erecting a march fence between their respective lands."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders, jointly and severally, or severally, are either bound to unite with the pursuers in the erection of a march fence or dyke to the extent of one-half, or are so liable in one-half of the expense of the erection thereof. (3) Separatim, The pursuers being crofters within the meaning of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, are proprietors of their respective holdings within the meaning of the March Fence Acts, and the defenders, jointly and severally, or severally, are bound to concur with the pursuers in the erection of a march fence as craved.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The action being incompetent and irrelevant, ought to be dismissed, with costs.

On 21st November 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (MacLachlan) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers are crofters within the meaning of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, and occupy holdings on the estate of Ardnamurchan, the property of the defender John James Dalgleish, including common grazing ground adjoining the farm of Glendryen, also on said estate, but not separated from it by a march fence: Finds that this action is one calling upon the said John James Dalgleish as proprietor, and the other defenders as tenants, of the said farm of Glendryen, to unite with the pursuers in

No. 173. erecting a march fence or dyke bounding the said common pasture, but finds that neither by statute nor by common law have the pursuers any right or title to make this demand: Therefore finds the action irrelevant, and dismisses the same.*

MacDonald v.
Dalglish.

On 13th April 1894 the Sheriff (M'Kechnie) recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, "in so far as it finds the action as directed against the defender John James Dalglish to be irrelevant: Quoad ultra adheres," and remitted the cause to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed.

On 11th May 1894 the Sheriff-substitute allowed a proof, and thereafter granted leave to Mr Dalglish to appeal.

Argued for the appellant;—The Sheriff-substitute had decided the case rightly. A crofter was not a heritor, and therefore the Act of 1661, cap. 41, did not apply to his case. The Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, again and again recognised, by using the words "tenant," "tenancy," "rent," &c., that, though the tenure of crofters was altered by certain privileges being given to them, they were still to remain tenants as they had been before its date. There could not be two heritors for one subject, and the Act did not oust the landlord; and further, they could not be looked upon as proprietors, as they had no power of alienating or redeeming their holdings, and, moreover, could be removed, like ordinary tenants, by the landlord, if they violated any of the conditions on which they held their crofts.

Argued for the respondents;—Crofters had an "inheritance" within the meaning of the Act 1661, cap. 41. They had a right in perpetuity, which passed to their heirs, and such a right in perpetuity gave them an interest and title to insist in the action. Their position as regarded forfeiture of their holding on non-payment of rent was analogous to that

* "NOTE.— . . . I must dismiss the action as irrelevant. In the first place, there is no common law of march fence in the law of Scotland (see rubric in the case of Strang v. Stewart, 31st March 1864, 2 Macph. 1015), and secondly, the statutes regarding march fences, in particular the Acts 1661, c. 41, 1669, c. 17, and 1685, c. 39, apply only to proprietors and not to tenants. A proprietor may be compelled by a neighbouring proprietor to erect a march fence or to concur with him in erecting it, and when the march fence is erected the tenants must preserve it,—that is to say, the obligation of keeping it up devolves on the tenants (Dudgeon v. Howden, 23d November 1813, F. C.) The pursuers are crofters on the estate of the defender Mr Dalglish, or, according to the definition in the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, they were at the date of the passing of that Act tenants of holdings from year to year, and Mr Dalglish is their landlord, and I cannot give them any rights other than those which they had as yearly tenants that are not given by the Act. Their position may, popularly speaking, be considered equivalent to, and perhaps in some respects even better than that of proprietors or owners, but they are nowhere in the Act treated or alluded to as proprietors. The only rights given to them analogous to those of proprietors are their fixity of tenure or indefeasibility of title, and a limited power of bequeathing the holding to members of their families, but these are hedged about by very stringent conditions, none of which are applicable to proprietors, and on violation of these conditions they may be removed by the landlord in the same way as ordinary tenants. They cannot sell, assign, sublet, or sub-divide their holdings, neither can they borrow money on the security of their holdings, because if the creditors attempt to attack their holdings and thus make them notour bankrupt, the holdings are forfeited and the landlord may resume possession. These are a few of the considerations which make it perfectly clear to me that it was never intended by this Act to put crofters in the position of heritors in the sense of the old Acts regarding march fences, and enable them to put forward a claim such as that in the present action. . . ."

MacDonald v.
Dalgleish.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that the Sheriff-substitute is right, and his note contains a very intelligent and lucid statement of his view of the case. The question before us really comes to be whether the pursuers are in a position to enforce against their own landlord the provisions of the Act 1661, cap. 41.

The whole of the Crofters Holdings Act of 1886 uses language suggestive of the relation of landlord and tenant, and the question is, does the Act of 1661 apply to a case of this kind? It seems to me that that Act was intended to encourage landlords in the full development of their estates, and it therefore provided that half of the cost of enclosing lands shall be paid by the one of two contiguous proprietors who does not initiate the improvement, to the proprietor who does. Now, are the pursuers in the position contemplated by that Act? The Crofters Holdings Act negatives the idea at every turn. They are tenants with certain privileges—that is, they cannot be removed from their holding if they comply with certain conditions, but they are not proprietors of the land, and they cannot dispose of it at their own hands. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that the Act of 1661 does not apply to them. The mere proposition that they are heritors or proprietors seems to me to raise countless difficulties, and I cannot see my way to affirm it.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The Crofters Holdings Act found crofters in the position of tenants liable to be turned out at any minute at the will of the landlord. The Legislature thought that this was not a satisfactory state of affairs, and I agree that it is an astonishing proposition to say that the Act, in altering that, has put the crofters in the position of landlords.

LORD M'LAREN.—This action is instituted under the old Scots Statutes providing in terms for compensation to a proprietor who encloses his land to the extent of half of the expense incurred, by giving a right to recover it from the adjacent proprietor, who also takes benefit from the erection of the fence.

In considering whether crofters are in a position to exercise the powers conferred by the Acts upon heritors, it is not necessary to consider whether or not they are heritors in the sense of having to contribute to the rates or of having the right to attend church meetings. Heritors in the sense of the Act 1661, cap. 41, are proprietors of heritable estate. They must shew that they have a right of property in the subjects which they desire to fence. Now, we find in the Crofters Act a peculiar species of tenure, which is said by the Sheriff to amount to a right of property, but I do not think that it has that character. Crofters before the passing of the Act were nothing but annual tenants, and we know that by custom many such families enjoyed the benefits of a tenancy perpetually renewed, and in few cases were they evicted if they paid their rents, although the custom was not enforceable in a Court of law. Now by statute a crofter has a legal right to remain in possession, because the Act of Parliament provides that he shall not be removed if he complies with certain conditions. In giving this right the Legislature never intended, as is seen from the phraseology of the Act, that the tenure should be essentially different from what it had been, viz., annual tenancy. They are not tenants for a specific number of years, and if they fail to pay their rent, or become bankrupt, or fail to observe certain

No. 173. other conditions, crofters may still be removed, and the landlord may then put in motion the privileges of eviction which he possesses in the case of ordinary annual tenants. This is a very different right from that of property. These crofters have more than an ordinary common law right of tenancy, but they have not enough to give them the right to compel their landlord to join with them in erecting a march fence. I therefore agree with your Lordships.

LORD KINNEAR was absent.

Bankruptcy—Agent and Client—Funds in agent's hands for special purpose—Defence in criminal trial.—A, a person charged with crime, wrote on 12th October to a law-agent, asking him to act for him in the criminal charge. On the same day he sent him £285, and authorised him "to use the same for the purposes of my defence in the criminal charge against me . . . as also to pay on my behalf any sum or sums that I may direct you." On 25th October A's estates were sequestered. The agent continued to make disbursements in connection with the defence, and further made other payments on A's directions, until 27th December, when A pleaded guilty and was sentenced. In an action of accounting at the instance of the trustee in the sequestration against the agent, held that the mandate to the agent was a revocable contract which fell by the sequestration, and that, therefore, the defender was bound to account to the trustee for all sums in his hands belonging to A at the date of the sequestration.

Bankruptcy—Arrestments within sixty days of sequestration—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 108.—Section 108 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, enacts that "no arrestment . . . of the funds or effects of the bankrupt on or after the sixtieth day prior to the sequestration shall be effectual, and such funds or effects, or the proceeds of such effects if sold, shall be made forthcoming to the trustee."

Held that while arrestments used within the sixty days are ineffectual to create a preference in the arresting creditor, they are effectual to lay a nezus on the funds to the effect of preventing the arrestee from paying them away to the prejudice of the trustee on the estate, to whom they were transferred by the sequestration.

IN November 1893 Robert Campbell M'Kenzie, trustee on the sequestered estates of Thomas James Fraser, corn-factor, Glasgow, raised an action in the Court of Session against James Murdoch Campbell, writer, Glasgow, concluding for an account of his intromissions with Fraser's estate, and for payment of £500, as the balance of his intromissions.

From the averments of parties the following facts appeared:—

On 11th October 1893 Fraser was apprehended on various charges of forgery.

On 12th October Fraser wrote to Mr Campbell, asking him to "act for me in the criminal charge presently against me."

On the same day Fraser handed to Campbell £285, 5s. 2d., and sent him the following letter:—"With reference to the money which I have instructed you to receive from Mr Howie, my cashier, and take possession of, I request and authorise you to use the same for the purposes of my defence in the criminal charge against me in such manner as you may think advisable, as also to pay on my behalf any sum or sums that I may direct you.—Yours truly."

In subsequent letters he directed Campbell to pay various sums for No. 174. clothing, &c., and "to pay for my maintenance in prison while awaiting trial."

On 14th October a creditor of Fraser used arrestments in Campbell's hands of all funds belonging to his debtor.

On 25th October Fraser's estates were sequestrated, and Mr M'Kenzie was appointed trustee thereon, and was confirmed on 13th November. The day after he was confirmed he called on Campbell to account for his intrusions with Fraser's estate.

On 27th December Fraser pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to a term of penal servitude.

Campbell lodged in process an account which more than exhausted the sum placed in his hands by Fraser. The account did not shew the dates on which the various payments in connection with preparing the defence and the prisoner's maintenance were made, but it was admitted that a considerable portion of the account had been incurred between the date of the arrestments and the date of the sequestration.

The pursuer averred;—"The whole intrusions took place within sixty days of Fraser's sequestration, and the said transaction under which they took place constituted an illegal preference in the defender's favour, which is null and void under the Act 1696, c. 5."

The defender averred, inter alia, that the arrestments of 14th October were invalid and ineffectual, in respect they were used in his hands within sixty days of Fraser's sequestration.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The funds in the defender's hands having been validly arrested on 14th October 1893, the defender is bound to pay over to the pursuer the whole funds in his hands as at said 14th October, under deduction only of sums actually due to himself at that date; or otherwise, and in any view, the estates of the said Thomas James Fraser having been sequestrated on 25th October 1893, the defender is bound to pay over to the pursuer the whole funds in his hands as at said 25th October, under deduction only of sums actually due to him at said last-mentioned date.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The money in the defender's hands having been specially appropriated to a special purpose under a new contract, the defender is not bound to count and reckon until that purpose is fulfilled, and then only for the balance. (7) The pretended arrestments referred to on record having been invalid and ineffectual, and not having attached anything in defender's hands, did not bar the defender from intruding with the funds in his hands.

On 22d March 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender is bound to pay to the pursuer the whole funds which belonged to the bankrupt, Thomas James Fraser, and were affected by the arrestment used in the defender's hands on 14th October 1893, under deduction of sums due to him by the bankrupt at that date; and also to pay any sums belonging to the bankrupt which came into the possession of the defender between the said date and 25th October 1893, and were in his possession at that date, being the date of sequestration: Therefore, to that extent and effect sustains the fourth plea in law for the pursuer, and to that extent and effect repels the pleas for the defender, and appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure."*

* "OPINION.—(After stating the facts his Lordship proceeded)—The chief question raised is whether, after Fraser's bankruptcy, the defender—his agent—was entitled, in the circumstances averred, to expend the bankrupt's funds in his hands in defending Fraser against the criminal charge, and in providing for his aliment while in prison.

No. 174. The defender reclaimed, and argued ;—The money was handed over to him by Fraser, under a distinct and separate contract, for a special purpose.

Campbell.

"The pursuer's plea on this point is,—'In any view the estates of the said Thomas James Fraser having been sequestered on 25th October 1893, the defender is bound to pay over to the pursuer the whole funds in his hands as at said 25th October, under deduction only of sums actually due to him at said last-mentioned date.'

"The defender's plea is,—'The money in the defender's hands having been specially appropriated to a special purpose under a new contract, the defender is not bound to count and reckon until that purpose is fulfilled, and then only for the balance.'

"There are subordinate questions which will be referred to afterwards. But the pursuer contends that this legal question, distinctly and sharply brought out by the pleas, should be decided as a question of law, and on the relevancy of the defence. He would not renounce probation, but held out the hope that the most of the subordinate questions might be adjusted, and submitted that, in any view, if that question were decided for him, any inquiry necessary would be greatly narrowed.

"It is not without some misgiving that I have entertained this suggestion. But I have come to the conclusion that a definite and important question of law is distinctly raised on the defender's averment and the pleas, and that it ought to be decided against him, assuming the truth of all his averments, about which, in fact, there is not much, if there is any, dispute.

"I assume, therefore, that the transaction said to have taken place on the 12th of October was unchallengeable, and that Fraser's money came unobjectionably into the defender's hands. There is in this view no question as to the Act 1696, cap. 5.

"It is necessary to see clearly what the defender's averment as to the footing on which he received Fraser's money amounts to. For it is not an averment of a contract between them that the defender should conduct Fraser's defence and aliment him for the sum of £250, 5s. 2d., to be paid to the defender irrevocably. It is no more than an averment that Fraser employed the defender as his agent to conduct his defence, and put money in his hands to enable him to fulfil that employment. It is an averment of a mandate in the defender's favour essentially revocable. There was no proposal to amend the averment, and no suggestion that such an interpretation of it was not in accordance with the defender's understanding and intention. That could hardly have been suggested, looking to the correspondence between Fraser and the defender, and especially to Fraser's letter of 12th October. That is one specialty of this transaction, viz., that the money was placed in the defender's hands on a revocable mandate. The other specialty is that the money was appropriated in the defender's hands for the benefit of the bankrupt himself.

"The question then is, whether money put in the hands of a law-agent on the footing explained was taken out of the bankrupt's estate, or was so appropriated as to defeat the title of the trustee?

"The pursuer contended that on the defender's averments the money put into the defender's hands remained under Fraser's control, and might have been reclaimed, so far as unexpended, whenever Fraser chose to recall the defender's mandate. It was therefore, he contended, money belonging to the bankrupt, which necessarily passed to his trustee,—there was no one else to whom it could be said to belong. Farther, that it could not be held to be so appropriated as to exclude the trustee, unless a jus quæsitum in it were vested in someone other than the bankrupt. It was maintained that that could not be the case here, because, under the contract of agency, the defender had no right to insist, against Fraser or anyone in his right, on retaining the funds put in his hands. The case, it was said, involved an attempt by the bankrupt to put his money beyond the reach of his creditors, while he retained his right to pose, viz., for the expenses of the defence. If the carrying out of Fraser's mandate did not cost the full amount in his hands, he would be bound to it and to the beneficial use of it, which was impossible in law—Learmonth v. Miller, May 3, 1875, 2 R. (H. L.) 62.

"The defender contended that, the antecedent contract being ex hypothesi unchallengeable, the charges and payments as they fell due from day to day were merely the fulfilment of that antecedent contract, and were therefore not struck at by the sequestration; and further, that the money was so appropriated to a special purpose as to be protected from the effect of the sequestration—M'Kenzie v. Finlay, October 29, 1868, 7 Macph. 27; Bell's Commentaries, ii. 71.

"I am of opinion that this money was never taken out of the right of the bankrupt, and of necessity passed to the trustee; that the effect of the sequestration was to withdraw the defender's mandate, so far as it authorised the defender to expend the funds he placed in his hands; and that in order to let in the principle that money in the hands of a bankrupt or of his agent may be protected against the sequestration by special appropriation, it is necessary that the right to the funds be taken out of the bankrupt and vested in some other person. But in this case there was no such right vested in anyone. I think that so long as funds belonging to a bankrupt remain under his control they cannot be withheld from his trustee.

"The point under consideration was somewhat strikingly brought out by two cases recently decided in England—Pollitt [1892], 1 Q. B. 175, and [1893] 1 Q. B. 455, and Re Charlwood ex parte Cripps [1894], 1 Q. B. 643.

"In the case of Pollitt money had been paid to a solicitor in order to defray the expenses of pending legal proceedings. On the bankruptcy of the client it was held that the solicitor was bound to pay to the trustee the amount due by him to the client at the date of the bankruptcy, and was not entitled to apply it in the conduct of the cause after the bankruptcy.

"The case of Charlwood is perhaps still more to the point. Charlwood was charged with murder, and on 3d December he entered into an agreement with a solicitor (Cripps), whereby he agreed to pay Cripps £250, and Cripps agreed on his part to conduct the defence for that sum. The money was paid on the 10th December, and Charlwood became bankrupt on 20th December, and Cripps had notice of the bankruptcy on the 21st. The whole sum seems to have been required for the defence, but apart from that circumstance, it was held that Charlwood's trustee was not entitled to the amount or any part of it, and that Cripps was not bound to account for it. The judgment, however, was expressly rested on the ground that by the agreement Cripps was entitled to the sum paid, and to no more, and that whereas in Pollitt's case the right to the money placed in the hands of the agent remained in the bankrupt, in the case of Charlwood the money had before bankruptcy ceased to belong to the bankrupt, and had become the property of the solicitor Cripps.

"That case expresses the distinction—at least one of the distinctions—on which I consider that the question under consideration falls to be decided. If the effect of the contract averred by the defender had been to pass the right to the sum paid from the bankrupt to the defender, then the trustee could not have claimed it unless he could challenge the prior transaction; but if the money under the contract averred remained the property of the bankrupt, it of necessity passed to the trustee.

"There would have been, I think, no doubt on this point had the litigation in which the solicitor was employed been an ordinary action relating to the bankrupt's estate. But it is said that there was a difference in this case, because the defence of the bankrupt from a criminal charge was personal to himself, and was not a matter in which the trustee could interfere, and that the result of the pursuer's plea was that a bankrupt in such circumstances would not have been defended at all. I do not know whether the trustee might or might not have undertaken the defence. But if he did not, then Fraser would only have been in the position of a person charged with a crime who had no money to

No. 174. hand the balance to the trustee, but he was entitled to retain the money and repay himself for his outlays and his own services in doing his duty. Each charge and payment as it fell due day by day was part of the fulfilment of the contract to carry through the defence to the end, and that contract having been made prior to the sequestration was not affected by it. The case fell under the rule of Charlwood's case,¹ as the money here had ceased to belong to Fraser, and had become the property of the defender. In any event, the pursuer's claim for an accounting from the date of the arrestments was ill founded. The arrestments were used within sixty days of the sequestration, and were, therefore, totally ineffectual under the 108th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, even in a question with the trustee.² The words of the Act were very general.*

Argued for the pursuer;—When Fraser handed this money to Campbell pay for his defence, which was in point of fact his predicament,—a very disadvantageous predicament, but only that in which all persons charged with crime and not possessed of funds necessarily are.

"The sequestration here took place on 25th October, and the trustee was not confirmed until 13th November. In that interval a large part of the account now founded on by the defender was incurred. It is averred that the defender's instructions never were recalled, but it is not averred that the judicial factor or the trustee ever waived their right to claim the funds in the defender's hands, or acquiesced in his expenditure of them in the defence of the bankrupt. If there had been an averment to that effect, I would have allowed a proof, but as I read the record, there is no such averment.

"On the whole, I consider the pursuer's contention well founded, that the defender must account to him for the funds belonging to Fraser which were in his hands at the date of the sequestration.

"I do not decide whether the defender may have a claim against the trustee if he can shew that he made any payments which the trustee would have been bound to make, nor is it necessary for me to say anything as to the defender's right to claim and rank on the bankrupt's estate.

"But the pursuer's claim goes somewhat beyond a claim for the money due by the defender to Fraser at the date of the sequestration, and extends to the sum in the defender's hands on 14th October, when a creditor used arrestments. This claim is expressed in the first part of his fourth plea. It depends entirely on the 108th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, which provides that no arrestments of the funds of a bankrupt executed on or after the sixtieth day prior to sequestration shall be effectual, 'and such funds or effects, or the proceeds of such effects if sold, shall be made forthcoming to the trustee.'

"The defender says that the effect of this clause and of the sequestration is that the arrestment was rendered invalid and wholly ineffectual, and that was the only ground on which the defender supported his seventh plea in law, and the averment as to the invalidity of the arrestments at the commencement of his answer 3. No authority on this point was quoted, but it appears to me that the contention for the pursuer is in accordance with the true construction of the section, and that the effect ascribed to the section by the defender would reduce it to an absurdity. I am therefore prepared to sustain the pursuer's plea, and to repel the seventh plea for the defender.

"My judgment does not determine either what the amount belonging to Fraser was which was in the possession of the defender at the date of the sequestration, nor what the sum was which was validly arrested. It is possible that funds may have come into the hands of the defender after the arrestment which may not have been covered by the arrestment, but which may be covered by the sequestration."

he kept absolute control over it. He could have recalled the mandate in favour of Campbell at any moment, and got a new agent, to whom the money would have had to be handed. There was no case of specific appropriation of a specific fund for a specific purpose as in Charlwood's case. The contract was simply a contract for personal services, which fell with bankruptcy. The case fell within the rule of Pollitt's case,¹ which was decided on the ground that the property of the money handed to the solicitor remained in the bankrupt. As regarded the question of the arrestments, the effect of the 108th section of the Bankruptcy Act was to lay a nexus on the funds in Campbell's hands to the effect of preventing him paying it away either to himself or to anyone else. The statute meant that arrestments within the sixty days were not to compete with the trustee, not that they were to be utterly ineffectual to impose a nexus on the funds.

No. 174.
June 13, 1894.
M'Kenzie v. Campbell.

LORD PRESIDENT.—On 11th October 1893 Thomas Fraser was apprehended on certain charges of forgery. When he was taken to prison he bethought himself of the necessity of looking after his affairs, and accordingly wrote to Mr Campbell asking that gentleman to act for him, and he authorised him “to take any steps you may think necessary to preserve my estate.” Immediately afterwards, with a view to carrying out the same purpose, he wrote, on 12th October 1893, the following letter:—“With reference to the money which I have instructed you to receive from Mr Howie, my cashier, and take possession of, I request and authorise you to use the same for the purposes of my defence in the criminal charge against me in such manner as you may think advisable, as also to pay on my behalf any sum or sums that I may direct you.—Yours truly.” Acting under this authority Mr Campbell took possession of the sum of £285, and thus became a depository for Fraser.

Now, the letter just quoted ends with a request that Mr Campbell should pay “any sum or sums that I may direct you.” That just means “hold the money to my order,” and the subsequent letters contain special directions for carrying that out. Mr Campbell thereafter began to make preparations for the defence, but ultimately Fraser pled guilty, and was sentenced to a term of penal servitude. Mr Campbell thus acted in precise accordance with his instructions, assuming those instructions to have retained validity. Unfortunately, however, on 25th October, about a fortnight after the apprehension, Fraser's estates were sequestrated. There is no doubt that from the date of the sequestration the money in Mr Campbell's hands became the money of Fraser's creditors, as opposed to Fraser himself, and from that time it was Mr Campbell's duty to look not to the bankrupt but to the trustee for instructions as to its disposal. It cannot be said that the mandate to Mr Campbell was not revocable, for it was admitted in argument that there was nothing to prevent Fraser from changing his agent and directing that the money should be handed over to his new adviser. On these grounds I think that there is no good defence to the claim of the trustee.

The words of Mr Justice Wright in describing the case of Pollitt exactly apply to the present case,—“The money of the debtor was handed to the solicitor, who was to apply it to meet future costs. On the occurrence of the bankruptcy the authority ceased, and the money went to the trustee.” On the other hand, the case of Charlwood is distinguishable on the facts, precisely (as pointed

No. 174. out by Mr Justice Wright) because before the bankruptcy occurred the money no longer belonged to Charlwood. This case is precisely the case of Pollitt, and June 13, 1894. M'Kenzie v. Campbell. is not the case of Charlwood.

Up to this point I have taken the case as if the date of the sequestration was the only date requiring attention. It appears, however, that on 14th October a creditor of Fraser used arrestments in Mr Campbell's hands, and it is said that the supervening sequestration rendered the arrestments wholly invalid and ineffectual. I do not so read section 108 of the Bankruptcy Act. That section I think only cuts down the rights of the arresting creditor as an individual, and expressly provides that the arrested funds "shall be made forthcoming to the trustee." The effect of the arrestments then is that a nexus was laid on the money in Mr Campbell's hands, which prevented him from paying it away to anyone, and the sequestration merely transferred the right of enforcing these arrestments from the arresting creditor to the trustee. On that ground I am of opinion that the trustee is entitled to say that the date of the arrestments is the date from which Mr Campbell was disabled from carrying out Fraser's mandate. I think, therefore, that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM.—It is clear in this case that the money in question remained at the absolute disposal of Fraser. There is no contract set forth in the correspondence that Fraser was to employ Mr Campbell to the end of the criminal prosecution, and there is no obligation on Mr Campbell to continue acting as agent. Further, the last words of the letter of 12th October are quite general, "to pay on my behalf any sum or sums that I may direct you," and special instructions as to the sums to be paid are given in the later letters.

Now, if that be so, the result in law is that the sequestration put an end to the mandate, and Mr Campbell had no longer any right to dispose of what was not Fraser's money but the trustee's. It may be hard that a man who has no money should have to defend himself, but it is harder that his creditors should have to pay for their debtor's defence. We were referred to two English cases, but I entirely agree that this case falls under the rule of Pollitt, and not under that of Charlwood. In the latter case there was a distinct contract that the solicitor would see the accused defended for a certain sum. It made no difference what the defence cost; the work was to be done for a certain price, which was paid over to the solicitor. That is not the case here, where we have just the facts of Pollitt's case. The agent there, as here, might withdraw at any time.

I further agree as to the effect of the arrestments. The 108th section means that the arrestments shall be ineffectual in a competition with the trustee, but not otherwise; and the effect here is that the money, held at the order of Fraser, could not be parted with except to the trustee. The Act says that the money "shall be forthcoming to the trustee," and that being so, to the trustee it must go. On both questions I therefore concur with your Lordship.

LORD M'LAREN.—In considering whether a client may make a bargain of the kind alleged here, which shall entitle an agent to go on working to the end of the piece of business even in competition with creditors, it must be kept in mind that a law-agent cannot stipulate for a benefit to himself in excess of the professional charges allowed by law, but there is no rule of law or expediency which debars a solicitor from bargaining to perform a certain business for a definite sum, being within the limits imposed by the table of fees. If such a bargain is made, and if the price or the money stipulated for is yet not paid, it is the right of the trustee in bankruptcy to put an end to the contract, and pay damages for breach of it. But I apprehend that if the price has been paid and the agent is in course of performing his part of the contract it would be impossible for the trustee to intervene and put a stop to the employment, for then the solicitor would say, "I have already been paid, and I am willing to complete my part of the contract." That is just the case of Charlwood, where the Court in England held that the trustee was not entitled to repayment. But the case here is not of that description. The employment was on the ordinary professional footing. The money was in the agent's hands, no doubt, but simply as a deposit, with an authority from the depositor to apply it in payment of services rendered and advances made de die in diem. Bankruptcy intervened, and the trustee quite rightly, and immediately after his appointment was confirmed, called upon Mr Campbell for an accounting, thus terminating Mr Campbell's employment as a law-agent. Thereafter the right of Mr Campbell was only to retain the money for payment of his account up to date. Subject to this qualified right of retention, he was accountable to the trustee.

On the question as to the effect of the arrestments, I see no reason why the arrestment should not receive full effect so as to attach the deposited money in Mr Campbell's hands, so far as not already applied to the purposes of the deposit. The nexus which resulted would prevent Campbell from paying to himself or others any further sum. The pursuer's claim on this point is answered by the 108th section, which says that the funds shall be forthcoming to the trustee. As the trustee for the creditors is vested in the bankrupt's whole estate, he therefore gets the whole of the arrested fund, and the purpose for which it is to be handed over to him excludes a preference alike in favour of the arrestee and of the arresting creditor. I therefore think that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right.

LORD KINNEAR was absent.

Agent and principal—Liability for disclosed principal—Agent and Client—Foreign—Custom—English custom applicable to solicitors.—In an action by an English solicitor against a law-agent in Scotland for payment of an account for professional services, the pursuer averred that he had been employed by the defender to conduct a litigation in England for a client, and that by the custom of England a solicitor employing another for a client was personally liable to the solicitor employed for costs. June 15, 1894.
Livesey v.
Purdom &
Sons.

After a proof, held that the pursuer had failed to prove that the custom extended to the case of an English solicitor employed by a Scots law-agent.

ON 22d June 1893 Alfred John Livesey, the successor in business and assignee of the firm of J. McKeever & Son, solicitors in Carlisle, raised an action against Messrs Thomas Purdom & Sons, solicitors, Hawick, for £604, 15s. 7d., as the balance of an account incurred by the pursuer and his authors in connection with an action which the pursuer had brought to a conclusion in the English Courts on behalf of James A. McDonald, contractor in Hawick, a client of the defenders. 2d DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

No. 175.
 June 15, 1894.
 Livesey v.
 Purdom &
 Sons.

The pursuer averred that on 10th August 1891 the defenders instructed John M'Keever, then sole partner of the firm of John M'Keever & Son, to raise the action at M'Donald's instance; that the pursuer and his firm accepted these instructions, and raised and carried through the action in accordance with instructions from the defenders, and on their responsibility and credit. (Cond. 5) "By the law of England, a solicitor employing another solicitor in the conduct of an action for a client, as in the present case, is held to employ him as his own agent in the matter, and is personally responsible to him for all costs and charges incurred. The contract of employment between the defenders and the said John M'Keever, and J. M'Keever, Son, & Livesey, and the pursuer, is an English contract, and the rights and liabilities of parties thereunder fall to be determined by the law of England, according to which the defenders are liable in payment of the account sued on."

The defenders denied that the pursuer or his authors had conducted the litigation on their employment, and their answer to cond. 5 was "Denied."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(3) In the circumstances condescended on, the contract of employment libelled is an English contract, and the liability of the defenders falls to be determined by the law of England. (4) The defenders being liable for the sum sued for by the law of England, et separatim, being liable therefor by the law of Scotland, decree should be granted as craved.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(4) Separatim, Assuming that the work charged for was done, and the outlays stated in the pursuer's account were made on the instructions of the defenders, they acted as agents for a disclosed principal, and are not themselves responsible to the pursuer or his alleged authors.

A proof before answer was allowed.

The evidence shewed that the defenders had introduced M'Donald to M'Keever & Son. In the opinion of the Lord Ordinary and the Court the evidence did not shew that the defenders, assuming them to have employed the pursuer or his authors, did so on terms other than those which the law would imply. It was admitted that by the common law of England an agent contracting on behalf of a disclosed principal binds his principal and not himself. With respect to the custom averred by the pursuer, it was proved by the evidence of English counsel that in England a custom judicially recognised prevails to the effect that an English solicitor employing another English solicitor on behalf of a client becomes personally liable to the solicitor employed for his costs, unless he expressly stipulate to the contrary. None of the members of the defenders' firm were qualified to practise in England.

The defenders admitted that they were liable to pay the pursuer £75.

On 6th April 1894 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defenders, who are writers in Hawick, in August 1891 employed the authors of the pursuer, who were solicitors in Carlisle, to raise and conduct on behalf of James Alexander M'Donald, contractor in Hawick, a certain suit in the English Courts: Finds that the said James Alexander M'Donald was a client of the defenders, and that they were duly authorised by him in the said matter, and that they duly disclosed to the pursuer's authors that they were acting on his behalf: Finds also that there was no agreement beyond what the law implied as to the defenders' responsibility for the costs of the suit: Finds that the sum sued for is the balance of the account incurred to the pursuer's authors for professional services rendered by them and their London agents in connection with the said suit: Finds that the contract of employment, being to be performed in England, its construction and effect falls to be determined by the law of England: Finds that by the law of England an agent duly authorised, contracting on behalf of a disclosed principal, does not pledge his personal credit: Finds that by custom, judicially recognised, there is an exception to this rule in the case of contracts of employment between country solicitors in England and also between country solicitors in England and London solicitors, but that the pursuer has failed to prove that the said exception applies where, as in the present case, one of the parties to the employment is not a solicitor practising, or entitled to practise, in England: Finds, therefore, that the defenders are not personally liable to the pursuer for the balance of the account sued for; and assoilzies them from the conclusions of the action, and decerns.*

Livesey v. Purdom & Sons.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The contract was to be performed in England, and therefore its construction and effect must be decided according to English law. It was proved that in England there prevailed a general custom, judicially recognised, the effect of which was that a

* "OPINION.— . . . The matter to be decided is whether the defenders, notwithstanding that they acted for a disclosed principal, are personally liable, in respect of an alleged rule of the law of England to the effect, as stated by the pursuer, 'that a solicitor employing another solicitor in the conduct of an action for a client as in the present case is held to employ him as his own agent in the matter, and is personally responsible to him for all costs and charges incurred.'

"There has been a long proof in the case, but I do not think there is any doubt about the material facts. . . . There was also a good deal of evidence as to the communications between the parties during the progress of the suit, but the result seems only to be that, beyond what the law implied, there was no special agreement or course of conduct from which such agreement can be inferred, with respect to the defenders' responsibility. The employment was constituted by correspondence, and the question really is what the correspondence imports.

"It is not disputed that the contract being to be performed in England its construction and effect must be determined according to English law; and as to that law English counsel have been examined on both sides. There does not, however, appear to be any real controversy as to what the law of England is. It is, on the one hand, admitted that by the general law of England an agent contracting on behalf of a disclosed principal binds his principal and not himself. On the other hand, it is also admitted that to this rule there is in England an exception established by custom, and judicially recognised, to the effect that an English country solicitor employing a London solicitor on behalf of a client becomes personally liable for the latter's costs, and that the result is the same as between English country solicitors when they employ one another. The point to be decided is whether the present case falls within the rule or within the exception.

"It appears to me that the parties here must be held to have contracted with reference not to the exception but to the general rule. In other words, I do not think it is proved that the exception in question extends beyond the case of solicitors practising and entitled to practise in England. It is clear upon the evidence that the exception depends not upon any general principle of jurisprudence, but upon what seems properly described as a custom judicially recognised; and I do not, I confess, see how that custom can be extended so as to include a case which can never come within it. The defenders here are no doubt solicitors,—that is to say, they practise the profession of the law; but they are not qualified to practise as solicitors in England, and in any question with English solicitors they are, I apprehend, simply laymen.

"On the whole, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that, according to the law of England, the defenders are not liable, and are entitled to absolvitor."

solicitor employing another solicitor on behalf of a client was liable for the costs of the action, unless he expressly stipulated to the contrary. Here it was proved that the defenders employed the pursuer to conduct the litigation in question, and accordingly they were liable for the costs, no special stipulation having been proved. The law of England was really just the same as the law of Scotland in the matter prior to the passing of the Law-Agents Act, 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. cap. 63), sec. 1.

Argued for the defenders;—Assuming that employment was proved, the custom founded on in England was only applicable to English solicitors inter se, and did not apply to a Scots solicitor employing an English solicitor to conduct a litigation in the English Courts on behalf of a client. The contract was for a disclosed principal, who consequently alone was liable.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have gone over the correspondence and evidence carefully, and the result is that I do not find evidence to shew that the defenders were ever placed in the position of being the pursuer's employers so as to make them liable for the costs of the English action.

A great deal has been said as to an alleged custom in England to the effect that where an English solicitor employs another solicitor in a litigation on behalf of a client, the first solicitor becomes liable for the costs incurred by the second solicitor, there being another term of the contract that the solicitor so liable is entitled to one-half the profits. An attempt was made to shew that this custom applied to the case of a Scottish solicitor who was the means of an English solicitor being employed. I see no ground whatever for that. That custom applies to a defined class, viz., English solicitors inter se. There is no such custom between law-agents in Scotland and solicitors in England. We cannot, therefore, in my opinion, give effect to this argument, which, however, could only apply if the employment averred were proved. I think that the result arrived at by the Lord Ordinary is the correct one.

LORD YOUNG.—There are two grounds upon which it is sought in this action to make the defenders liable.

It is said, in the first place, that a certain custom has grown up, and now prevails among solicitors in England, and is applicable to the facts of this case. That custom happens to be—there are customs like it in trade, and in that of shipbuilding especially—that if one solicitor introduces a client to another solicitor in order that a specific piece of business should be carried out, there shall be understood to have arisen a certain relationship between the two solicitors; the first solicitor shall be held, unless he expresses himself to the contrary, to guarantee that the client he has introduced is a good and paying client, and in return he is to receive for his services in effecting the introduction one-half of the profits of the business to be performed.

Now, I am of opinion that that custom, which I assume has grown up and reigns among English solicitors, has no application to the facts of this case, which is not one between English solicitors. If the solicitors in Carlisle intended to hold Messrs Purdom & Sons liable to them for the account, they should have taken a guarantee from the latter to that effect.

The law of Scotland recognises established customs provided they are honest and expedient, and will enforce them as furnishing the terms of a contract in regard to matters where nothing is expressed. But custom is matter of fact which requires to be established to the satisfaction of the Court, although when the custom is of such a nature as is here alleged the Courts come to recognise and apply it without evidence. But the idea that the custom upon which the pursuer here founds has been shewn to apply to the facts of this case cannot in my opinion be entertained.

Livesey v. Purdom & Sons.

The second and other ground upon which liability is sought to be established against the defenders is that they so communicated with the pursuers as to justify them in taking up and conducting the piece of business under the belief that they were to look to the defenders for payment of the account.

I am of opinion that here also the pursuers must fail, because I think the parole evidence and the correspondence do not establish any such case.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I have come to the same result. I think that the custom does not apply to the present case.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with the views which your Lordships have expressed.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find that the defenders admit that a sum of £75 is due by them to the pursuer: Find that the defenders are not due to the pursuer any further sum, whether as having employed the pursuer on their responsibility to conduct the litigation for James Alexander Macdonald against the Workington Corporation or otherwise: Decern against the defenders for the said sum of £75: Quoad ultra assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the summons."

Strachan v. Aberdeen District Committee of the County Council of Aberdeenshire.

Reparation—County Council—Neglect of duty—Road.—Held that a claim of damages is competent against a county council for injuries arising from their neglect of duty in failing to keep a road sufficiently fenced.

IN June 1893 Charles Strachan, baker, Aberdeen, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against the Aberdeen District Committee of the County Council of Aberdeenshire, concluding for payment of £63, 12s. damages for injuries to a horse and van which fell into a burn by the side of a road, which was under the management of the defenders.

Sheriff of Aberdeenshire.

The pursuer averred that there was no fence or protection of any kind on the side of the road next the burn,—(Cond. 6) "The defenders are responsible for the condition of said road, and were in fault in respect said road is at the part in question dangerous, and they were bound both at common law and under the Statute 1 and 2 William IV. cap. 43, to have it properly fenced and protected. The said road was known to be dangerous and unsafe, and prior to the management of the said road being transferred to the said County Council, complaints had been made of the unsafe condition of the said road at the part in question. The defenders did nothing to put the said road into a safe condition until after the accident libelled. They have since erected a fence at the part in question."

The defenders pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer's servant who was driving.

Proof was led, and on 17th February 1894 the Sheriff-substitute (Brown)

No. 176. pronounced an interlocutor finding that contributory negligence had been proved on the part of the pursuer's servant, and that the defenders were therefore not liable.

Strachan v.
Aberdeen
District Committee of the County Council of Aber-
deenshire.

On appeal the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith), on 29th March, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in law that no action is maintainable against the County Council or its District Committee for suffering a road to be out of repair and in a dangerous condition: Therefore assolizies the defenders from the conclusions of the action."*

* "NOTE.— . . . The case raises a question which does not seem to have been submitted to the Sheriff-substitute, and on which there is very little Scottish authority, which is, in my opinion, quite clear in point of principle. The pursuer seeks damages from the County Council, or, in other words, the public. We are all familiar with actions of damages against a road authority for endangering the public safety by leaving a heap of stones on the highway unguarded, or digging a pit and leaving it unfenced and unlighted. In operations like these there is nothing wrong, they are a necessity of road administration, provided they are done with reasonable care, but when done without this care they are justly held actionable. It is obvious, however, that between doing something wrong in itself, or wrong because done in a wrongful manner, and doing nothing, there is the widest possible difference, and it does not follow that a mere failure to keep in repair a road in a state of disrepair necessarily entitles the individual injured to redress. Yet the present action is laid entirely on this last ground, as very clearly appears from the condescendence. It is there said,—'Although at one time there existed (between the road and the burn) a stone and lime fence it has been allowed to fall into a ruinous and dilapidated condition'—Cond. 2. Yet, nevertheless, the defenders, the District Committee, 'did nothing to put the road into a safe condition until after the accident'—Cond. 6. As was said in the House of Lords in the Mersey Docks case, in every case the liability of a body created by statute must be determined upon a true interpretation of the statute under which it is created. When the county roads were brought under the operation of the Act of 1878, the system of administration contemplated was this, the district surveyor was bound once a-year to make up a report on the condition of the highways within his district, and containing a specification of the works and repairs to be executed thereon, and an estimate of the sums required for the purposes of the highways within the district (sec. 49). These reports were to be passed on by the District Committee with their recommendations to the General Board, which was then 'to consider and review the same, and give such orders as may seem necessary, and their decision shall be final' (sec. 50). I do not know whether this particular road was ever reported on or not. If it was not the fault, if any, lay with the surveyor, and the case of Kinloch v. Clark, 4 Macph. 107, decides that for such fault no action lies at the instance of the person injured. A surveyor exercises only a delegated authority. In most things he must first communicate with the committee, and if he fails in a pressing case to make such communication, he may be open to censure or dismissal by the committee, but he cannot be answerable to any member of the public for his breach of duty. If, on the other hand, the surveyor has done his duty in the matter, by bringing it before the District Committee, which decides to do nothing, I do not see how a Court of law can review a decision which the Act of Parliament expressly declares shall be final.

"In a different but equally effective way the old Turnpike Act, 1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 43, clearly excludes any such claims as the present. Sec. 117 prescribes the proceedings which are to be taken in case the trustees suffer the roads to fall into disrepair. In effect the remedy provided is the old common law appeal to the Court of Session in the form of petition and complaint against a public body, and no one is to be at liberty 'to present any complaint, or to institute any proceedings on any of the grounds above mentioned, before any other Court, or in any other manner than as aforesaid.' This follows sec. 94, prescribing a similar course of proceeding in the Sheriff Court, in such a case

The question of competency was not raised on the pleadings.

The pursuer appealed, and argued ;—On the evidence there was no contributory negligence. On the competency.—The County Council were liable in damages for neglect of duty in failing to fence a road at a dangerous part. The obligation to fence roads was imposed on road trustees by section 94 of the Turnpike Act, 1831.* That section was incorporated with the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, and the County Council were liable to perform all the duties and obligations of the road trustees whom they succeeded. The view of the Sheriff was quite novel

as the present, namely, neglect to raise a parapet, or provide other adequate means of security at dangerous parts of the road. Reading these two sections together, as I think we are bound to do, they seem to prove that, down at least to 1878, an action of damages against road trustees for suffering a road to fall into disrepair was clearly incompetent.

“No doubt while section 94 is incorporated in the Act of 1878 section 117 is omitted, but that does not warrant the inference that thereby a new liability was intended to be created. The statute simply transfers the management of the roads to a new body, and in such a case the rights and liabilities are presumed to be transferred as they existed at the time of the transfer, unless in so far as they are expressly varied. It was on this ground that the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Gibson v. Mayor of Preston, L. R., 5 Q. B. 218, decided that an action for personal injuries, sustained by one of the public through the non-repair of a highway, does not lie against a local board constituted under the Local Health Act of 1848, a doctrine repeated by the Court of Appeal in Glossop v. Heston, 12 Ch. Div. 102, and recently affirmed by the House of Lords in Cowley v. The Newmarket Local Board [1892], App. Ca. 345.

“There is an apparent contradiction between this view and the Rothsay case recently before the First Division, but in that case it was admitted that if in the opinion of the Court the road was dangerous, the defenders, both at common law and under the statute, were bound to fence. In the only similar case of neglect (as far as I can find) where the pursuer succeeded in getting damages (Aitken v. Duncan, 14 S. 204), the verdict went by consent, and, with one exception, in every case which has occurred since the reinstatement of Duncan v. Findlater as an authority in this branch of the law, the cause of actions has arisen, as they say in England, not from nonfeasance but malfeasance. The exception is Greer v. The Stirling Road Trustees, 9 R. 1069, where the Second Division, against the advice of Lord Young, differed from the Local Authority as to the sufficiency of a paling, but no question of competency was raised. Indeed, if this action were sustained I do not see where it would end. If a claim of damages is relevant against an administrative body for neglect of duty resulting in personal injury, it must be equally so where the complaint is that they failed to take up and timeously carry through some improvement scheme relating to drainage, lighting, or water, for which legislative sanction had been obtained, whereby great advantages would have accrued to the complainer or his property. For all this the ratepayers of the county would have to pay, which, in the words of Lord Justice James, would be ‘a very serious matter indeed for the community at large,’ and subject our system of local representative government in towns and counties to a form of judicial control which the Local Government Acts certainly never contemplated.”

* The Turnpike Act, 1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 43, sec. 94, enacts “That the trustees of every turnpike road shall erect sufficient . . . fences along the sides of all bridges, embankments, or other dangerous parts of the said roads, and if they shall fail therein it shall be lawful for the Procurator-fiscal or any commissioner of supply . . . to prosecute the trustees of any such turnpike road, before the Sheriff of the shire in which such road is situated, who shall judge and determine therein in a summary manner, and upon finding the complaint well founded may compel the said trustees to remedy the matter complained of. . . .”

No. 176. to the law of Scotland, and was contrary to a long series of decisions. The case of *Duncan v. Findlater*¹ had been practically overturned by the decision of the House of Lords in the case of the Mersey Docks,² where the liability of public bodies in the general case was recognised, and the Court in Scotland at once returned to what had been the law before Duncan v. Findlater, in their decision in the case of Virtue.³ Since that case there was an unbroken series of cases in which the liability of public authorities was recognised; in fact, since then no one had ventured to question it.⁴ The Sheriff said that in England public authorities were not liable for nonfeasance, only for malfeasance. That was a distinction not known to the law of Scotland. The English law on the matter was decided in the case of the Men of Devon,⁵ and the later cases of Gibson,⁶ Glossop,⁷ and Cowley,⁸ only decided that there was nothing in the local Acts under consideration to take the cases from under the rule of the Men of Devon. But the law of the Men of Devon was not the common law of Scotland; there was no trace of any such doctrine to be found in our books. The action was competent.

Strachan v.

Argued for the defenders;—The action was incompetent on the ground stated by the Sheriff. There was no doctrine of the common law of Scotland recognising the liability of public authorities for damage for failure to do their duty in such a matter as this. When a member of the public raised an action of damages against such a public body as the County Council it simply came to be an action of damages by a member of the public against himself. There being no authority in the common law for the competency of the action, the Court ought not to run counter to the long train of decision in England from the Men of Devon down to Cowley's case, to the effect that such an action was incompetent.⁹ It could not be disputed that a practice had grown up in Scotland under which public bodies had been found liable for such neglect of duty as was alleged here, but there had been no solemn decision on the point; in all the cases the competency had simply been assumed. Section 94 of the Turnpike Act pointed to the remedy which the Legislature thought the appropriate one, viz., an action to have the trustees, or here the County Council, ordained to fence the road, and though the 117th section of that statute was repealed by the Roads and Bridges Act, it shewed that the Legislature did not contemplate any such form of action being taken as was done here.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have first to deal with the judgment of the Sheriff-depute, in which he has found in law that no action is maintainable against the County Council or its District Committee for suffering a road to be out of repair, No. 176. and in a dangerous condition. Now, that is a very important general proposition of law, and it is observable that it never occurred to the Aberdeenshire County Council to put forward this plea, which, if it were sound, ought to have been stated in limine. So far as it goes, the attitude of the County Council is in accordance with the impression which one's recollection of practice has formed, —that this theory of the Sheriff,—whether it may ultimately be justifiable on reason or not,—is foreign to our practice.

Strachan v.
Aberdeen
District Committee of the County Council

The subject is, no doubt, an interesting one, but I cannot help thinking that the reasoning of the Sheriff proceeds upon an assumption regarding the common law of Scotland which is unsupported by authority. It seems clear enough that the cases which he refers to as decided in the English Courts rest upon the following statement which is given in the latest case in the Privy Council (Municipality of Pictou v. Geldert [1893] A. C. 524) of the common law of England,—“Public bodies charged with the duty of keeping public roads and bridges in repair, and liable to an indictment for a breach of this duty, were nevertheless not liable to an action for damages at the suit of a person who had suffered injury from their failure to keep the roads and bridges in proper repair.” Now, against that, so far as Scotland is concerned, we have the fact that there is a whole series of cases in which public bodies of road trustees, including County Councils, which are the latest development of road trusts, have not questioned their liability to answer in damages where negligence is proved, and have been found liable in damages for failure to keep roads in repair. I think, also, that the cases which relate to municipal bodies, viz., Police Commissioners, are quite in point on the question of the common law view of their liability to third parties, because the case of Virtue and the other cases which Mr Dickson pointed out involve the general underlying doctrine that bodies of road trustees, whether in town or country, are liable to third parties for damage arising from their negligence. Now, it has been attempted by the Sheriff to support his view by reference to sec. 94 of the Turnpike Act, which is incorporated in the Roads and Bridges Act of 1878. That section, however, merely obliquely and incidentally supports his general view of the common law immunity of such bodies, for in its terms it purports merely to limit the modes of action by which a person demanding of the trustees the execution of certain works as in fulfilment of their statutory obligations shall obtain such execution of the works. But that is manifestly a remedy of a different kind from the one now in question, which is an action of damages by a person complaining that he has suffered special damage in his own person or property from breach of the statutory duty. Again, the 117th sec. of the Turnpike Act stands in this position, that it is not incorporated in the Act of 1878, and accordingly, so far as the existing law is concerned, it does not afford an argument. It might do so if it reflected any light upon the common law of Scotland, and supported the view taken by the Sheriff, but, there again, I think the same answer applies, that sec. 117, like sec. 94, is dealing with a different matter,—that is, the remedy of a person who claims more facilities for travelling than the road trustees will allow him. Accordingly, I do not think that these sections, either the one standing in the existing statute or the one which historically relates to this question, really give any support to the view of the Sheriff. But apart from these sections, the view seems to be unsupported by anything in the text writers or decisions, and is certainly diametrically opposed to the current practice in regard to bodies litigating in this Court, there being a whole series of cases where that liability has been recognised. Therefore, I think it is impossible for us to give countenance to this doctrine of the Sheriff, because we should be running counter to what must now be regarded as the existing common law, and the sound construction of the statutes bearing on the liabilities of road trustees. Therefore, in my opinion, the Sheriff's interlocutor must be recalled. (His Lordship then proceeded to deal with the merits of the cause.)

LORD ADAM.—The judgment of the Sheriff-depute in this case proceeds upon the ground that the action is not maintainable against the District Committee of the County Council. Now, it appears to me, that if we were to affirm that ground of judgment, we should necessarily recognise this, that we and our predecessors for many years have been going on an entirely wrong course, and that this Court, which has for years held road trustees liable for negligence and fault has been quite wrong in doing so. It may be so, but I am afraid that we must be put right in that matter by another Court. I think that it is unnecessary to say more on the subject, because the practice has been so invariable that we must, like our predecessors, follow it now. I have, therefore, no hesitation in thinking that the Sheriff's interlocutor must be recalled.

LORD M'LAREN.—According to the law of Scotland as hitherto understood and administered, parliamentary trustees and Local Authorities constituted by Act of Parliament, although performing their duties without remuneration and without any view to profit, are responsible for negligence in the same manner as railway companies or other corporations who carry on public undertakings for profit. It is true that this principle suffered a temporary eclipse in consequence of the judgment in Duncan v. Findlater which was founded on what seems to be a somewhat paradoxical application of the doctrine of ultra vires. It was held that when Parliament had authorised the levying of rates by a public body for public purposes this involved a practical immunity on the part of the administrators of those rates from civil responsibility for wrong, because the application of the rates to payment of damages would not be within the purposes of the trust. Now the decision of the House of Lords in the celebrated litigation arising out of the responsibility of the Mersey Docks Commissioners restored the law to what, in Scotland at least, had been understood to be the sound principle of civil responsibility, and, acting upon the views finally taken in the highest Court, this Court in the case of Virtue re-established the principle of civil liability on the part of Local Authorities. I come, therefore, to the opinion that according to that decision, which is binding on us, if the Aberdeenshire County Council have done wrong to the pursuer they are bound to make reparation for that wrong. The cases cited to us in support of the Sheriff's interlocutor seem to shew that in England there is an exception to the general rule of the responsibility of public bodies in the case of road authorities; but I am unable to gather from the terms of the judgment in the last case—the Newmarket case—whether this is a universal exemption applicable to all public bodies charged with the administration of roads, or whether it depends upon the terms of each individual Act of Parliament. I rather collect from the judicial opinions, and especially from that of Lord Herschell, that the English Courts were in a manner bound by the decision in the ancient case of the Men of Devon, and that unless there was something in the terms of the local Act of Parliament which took the case out of the rule laid down in that decision and laid upon the Local Authority certain duties subject to the sanction of the responsibility for negligence, no action against them would lie. But it could not be seriously maintained that the decision in the Men of Devon had any relation to the Scots law of reparation. It was an action depending upon peculiarities in the English system of law, and I see nothing in this decision which ought to induce us to reconsider the principle and practice of the law of reparation as hitherto administered by our Courts.

Succession—Testament—Construction—"Residue."—The presumption is that the word "residue" occurring in a testamentary writing carries the residue of the testator's whole estates and not merely the balance of a particular fund.

A lady by holograph testamentary paper left legacies amounting in all to £1000 including one of £100 "to my old and valued friend J. M." under the declaration that these legacies were to be paid free of legacy-duty; and then concluded as follows:—"The £1000 so bequeathed is in the hands of my brother . . .—also £200 which latter if not expended by me before my decease & still in his hands will be—to be taken for all just and lawful debts to give mournings to J. my servant to the extent of £2—also mournings to" the wife of a nephew "to the extent of £5—Any residue to be given to J. M." By later testamentary papers the testator nominated an executor and left a number of legacies of specific articles. Her whole testamentary papers were found after her death in an envelope, on which were the words, holograph of her, "My will" and her subscription. She left property amounting to £1514 without deducting debts, which were of small amount.

In a competition between J. M. and the testator's next of kin claiming ab intestato, held that the words "any residue" in the first testamentary paper carried the residue of the testator's general estate to J. M. and not merely the balance of the sum of £200 mentioned in the immediately preceding clause of the paper.

MISS JANET SCOTT MORRISON, residing at Glenleith, Colinton, died on 2D DIVISION. 7th October 1893, leaving several holograph testamentary writings. By the first of these writings, which was dated 31st August 1893, Miss Morrison began by bequeathing certain pecuniary legacies amounting in all to £1000, and including one of £100 "to my old and valued friend Janet M. Millar, residing at Castle Douglas." The writing then proceeded:—"All the above Legacies to be paid free of legacy-duty—The Thousand pounds so bequeathed is in the hands of my Brother William, merchant Leith—also Two hundred pounds, which latter if not expended by me before my decease & still in his hands will be—to be taken for all just and lawful debts to give mournings to Jessie my servant to the extent of Two pounds—also mournings to Nephew John Morrison's wife to the extent of Five Pounds—Any Residue to be given to Janet Morrison.

By the second testamentary writing, styled by the deceased “Codicil No. 1,” and undated, she increased the sums left for mournings to £4 and £10 respectively, and nominated Mr William F. Millar, merchant, Leith, to be her sole executor, leaving him £20 for his services as executor.

The remaining testamentary writings contained only specific bequests of articles of furniture, &c.

These writings were found enclosed in an envelope on which were written these words, holograph of Miss Morrison “My will Janet S. Morrison.”

After Miss Morrison’s death questions arose as to the extent of the bequest of “residue” to Miss Janet M. Millar, and a special case was presented, the parties to which were (1) Miss Morrison’s executor, (2) Miss Janet M. Millar, (3) William Morrison and others, Miss Morrison’s next of kin.

The case set forth the foregoing facts, and stated further that the estate of the deceased consisted of personal property amounting to £1514, 19s. 6d. without deducting debts, which were of small amount.

The first question in law was,—“(1) Do the words, ‘Any Residue to be given to Janet Millar,’ occurring in the first holograph testamentary writing referred to, give right to the said Janet Millar only to any balance remaining of the £200 mentioned in the said writing, after deduction of debts and the sums for mournings left by the testatrix; or, Are these words sufficient to carry any free moveable estate belonging to the deceased at the date of her death, after providing for the specific legacies and bequests left by the testatrix, and the debts and expenses of the executry?” Then followed a question (to be answered in the event of its being held that the word residue carried only the balance of the £200) as to what debts were a burden on the £200.

Upon the first question the second party maintained that the bequest of residue gave her the testator’s whole estate not otherwise disposed of;¹ the third parties, that by “residue” was meant only the balance of the £200, and that the residue of the general estate fell to them ab intestato, there being no other clause in the will disposing of residue.²

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is plain that the document the terms of which we are asked to construe in this case was left by this lady, Miss Millar, as a settlement of her whole affairs; indeed, the envelope in which the document is enclosed has written upon it, in her own handwriting, the words, “My will.” In that document we find, in the place at which we would naturally expect to find them in a settlement disposing of the lady’s whole estate, words which seem to be a direction as to what is to be done with the residue of her estate after giving effect to the particular directions settling what shall be done with the greater part of it. These words are, “Any residue to be given to Janet Millar,” and so on. I think we must read these words as meaning that she gives the residue of her whole estate, after providing for special legacies, to Janet Millar, unless the other parties to the case can shew some circumstances weighty enough to lead us to a contrary conclusion.

Now, it was urged as a reason for coming to a contrary conclusion that the word "residue" occurs in immediate collocation with a clause disposing of a sum of £200 in the hands of the testator's brother, with reference to which she directs that if it is not expended before her death it is "to be taken for all just and lawful debts, to give mournings to Jessie my servant to the extent of £2, also mournings to nephew John Morrison's wife to the extent of £5," and then follow the words in question, "any residue," &c. It is contended by the testator's next of kin that looking to the mention of this sum of £200, and to the way in which the testator says it is to be applied, and also to the position of the clause as to residue, we must hold that that clause refers merely to what may remain of the £200 after applying it as the testator has directed. I can see no necessity for so reading that clause, and as there is a presumption that the word "residue" was intended to carry the residue of the whole estate, I think the word should here receive its ordinary effect.

Morrison.

It is true, as was said by counsel for the next of kin, that in an earlier part of the settlement Miss Millar does receive a considerable sum of money as a legacy, which it was contended was unnecessary if she was also to be residuary legatee. I do not think that that shews more than that the testatrix was not aware of the amount of estate she had to dispose of, and imagining that it was less than it really was, directed that the balance, if any, should go to her friend. On the whole, I think we must read these words as giving to Janet Millar a right to the residue of the whole estate after paying the legacies provided for by Miss Morrison.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think that the words which we have to construe here must be read according to their ordinary meaning, unless there is anything in the context which would lead us to take a different view. I cannot see anything in the language of this will to lead me to think that the testatrix intended that the words should mean anything different from their ordinary signification.

M'Laren.

Property—House—Gable—Boundary—Prescription—Possession—Presumption.—The titles of two adjoining properties in a burgh described the properties (in so far as coterminous) as being each bounded by the other. About the year 1770 there was erected on the westmost of these properties a house, the scarcement stones of whose east gable extended about nine inches beyond the line of the gable. Some years after the building of this house there was erected on the other property a building which came to be used as a byre. This byre had no west gable of its own, the east gable of the other house being used as its west gable, and the north and south walls of the byre rested upon the scarcement stones of the gable of the other house, and were built against that gable.

No. 178.

Houston v.
M'Laren.

In 1892 the proprietor of the house on the westmost property proposed to project the roof of his house (which was higher than the byre), about seven inches to the east of his east gable, and, in an action by the proprietor of the byre for interdict against this proposed projection, maintained that the boundary of his property was the east line of the scarcement stones and not the east line of the gable of his house, contending that the presumption was that his author had built his house entirely within his own property.

A proof shewed that the proprietor of the byre, and his authors, had, for more than the prescriptive period, possessed as belonging to the byre the entire area within the walls of the byre to the east of the defender's gable.

Held that the pursuer's titles, coupled with the possession that had followed upon them, shewed that the boundary between the two properties was the east line of the gable and not the east line of the scarcement stones, and consequently that the pursuer was entitled to interdict against the defender projecting his roof as proposed.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Perthshire.

IN September 1892 William Houston, dairyman, Coupar-Angus, the proprietor of a byre in Hill Street there, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Perth against James Alexander Playfair M'Laren, the proprietor of the subjects immediately to the west of the pursuer's property, and also against David Reid, builder, Coupar-Angus, in which the pursuer prayed that the defenders should be interdicted from building or continuing to build the roof of a house on the defender M'Laren's property so as to project over the side walls and roof-eaves of the pursuer's byre, alleging that in so building the roof of the defender M'Laren's house the defenders were encroaching on the pursuer's property. In answer, the defender M'Laren denied that in so building the roof he was encroaching on the pursuer's property, and the defender Reid stated that he was the builder merely, and had nothing to do with the question raised.

The question arose in the following circumstances, as disclosed by a proof, and by the titles produced: The pursuer and the defender M'Laren held their respective properties of the same superior, M'Laren's feu having been given off about 1770, and that of the pursuer at a later date. Each property was merely described as bounded by the other in so far as they adjoined each other. About 1770 a house was built on M'Laren's feu, the scarcement stones of the east gable of which projected about nine inches eastward of the line of the gable itself. The pursuer's byre was built after the house on M'Laren's feu. It had no west gable of its own, M'Laren's east gable being used instead, and the north and south walls of the pursuer's byre rested upon the scarcement stones of M'Laren's gable, and the ends of these walls were built against that gable. The whole of the area thus enclosed by the three walls of the pursuer's byre and M'Laren's gable (including the portion upon which the scarcement stones rested) had been possessed by the pursuer and his authors as a byre or otherwise for more than the prescriptive period. The top of the scarcement stones was somewhat above the level of the rest of the floor of the byre.

Shortly before the raising of the present action M'Laren took down his house, and proposed to rebuild it somewhat higher, with a roof which extended about seven inches eastward of the line of his east gable. The roof so built would thus have been wholly within the east line of the scarcement stones of the east gable, and M'Laren maintained that he was entitled so to build the roof on the ground that the presumption was that his predecessor in building the original house in 1770 kept not merely the east gable, but the scarcement stones upon which it rested, wholly within his own property. The pursuer denied that there was any such presumption, and maintained that his titles, coupled with the possession that had followed upon them for more than the prescriptive period, gave him a right of property in the whole area of the byre from the line of the defender M'Laren's east gable eastward, and consequently that the proposed projection of the roof beyond that line was an invasion of that right.

Houston v.
M'Laren.

On 11th January 1894 the Sheriff-substitute (Grahame) pronounced this interlocutor:—(After findings in fact)—“Find that it is not proved that the defender, in his said building operations, has threatened, or at the date of this action was threatening, to project his roof beyond the boundary of his own property, or to infringe upon the pursuer's rights of property in his adjoining subjects: Therefore refuses to grant the interdict craved: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses,” &c.

On appeal the Sheriff (Jameson) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Recalls the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of 11th January 1894: Finds (1) That the pursuer and defender M'Laren are conterminous proprietors of certain subjects in Coupar-Angus, situated to the west of Hill Street; (2) that in 1892, and for forty years previous, the state of the subjects was as follows:—There was an old two-storey house on the defender's property, with its east gable immediately adjoining the pursuer's property, while on the pursuer's property there was erected a building, latterly used as a byre, the walls and roof of which were built close up to and rested on the said east gable of the defender's house; the scarcements of the foundations of said gable projected about 9 inches beyond the east face of the gable; (3) that the title-deeds of the parties merely describe the properties as bounded by each other; (4) that at the date of raising the present action, the defender M'Laren, whose property lies immediately to the west of the subjects occupied by the pursuer, was carrying on certain building operations in connection with the rebuilding of his house; (5) that the roof of the defender M'Laren's new house projects 7 inches or thereby beyond the line of the east face of the east gable of the defender's old house: Finds in point of law (1) that the titles of the parties fall to be interpreted by the possession had twenty years prior to the raising of this action; (2) that the possession had by the pursuer and his predecessors, as above described, was sufficient in law to constitute possession of the ground up to the line of the east face of the east gable of the defender's old house, notwithstanding the projection of the foundations of said gable beyond said line, and that said line must therefore be held to be the boundary between the property of the pursuer and that of the defender M'Laren; (3) that the defender M'Laren's building operations, so far as they consist of projections of the roof or other portions of the new house beyond the line of the east face of the east gable of the old house, constitute an invasion of the pursuer's rights of property, and that the pursuer is entitled to interdict against said proceedings: Therefore interdicts the defenders, and all others acting for them, or under the instructions of any of them, from encroaching upon the pursuer's property on the west boundary thereof, and specially from building, or continuing to build, a roof projecting over the roof-eaves and side walls of the pursuer's byre,” &c.*

* “NOTE.— . . . It was not without difficulty that I arrived at the conclusion I have done. I am of opinion that the projection of the scarcements of the foundation of the defender's old house, beyond the line of the gable wall, does not raise a presumption that these scarcements were within the original boundary of the defender's property. On the contrary, I think the presumption rather is that the defender's predecessors desired to take full advantage of their property by building the gable up to their boundary line, and this necessarily involved some projection of the scarcements into the adjoining property.

Houston v.
M'Laren.

The defenders appealed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is very unfortunate for all parties, as the matter in dispute is of trifling value. The facts of the case are that the defender, who owns a small property in Coupar-Angus upon which a house or cottage is built, has recently raised the height of the house, and in doing so has endeavoured to put the roof of his house a few inches further out than the wall which supports it. Neither party has any title to his property which specifies the boundaries of it except by describing it as bounded by the other, and while the defender and his predecessors have had his house for fifty years, the pursuer and his predecessors have had right to and have occupied a byre next to it for more than forty years. The two side walls of the byre rest upon the scarcement stones of the foundation of the house, but the byre has no end wall of its own, the defender's wall being used as the end wall of the byre.

The defender says that there is a presumption that in taking the scarcement of his gable wall outside the line of the wall itself, he put the scarcement upon his own property, and that in fact the line of the scarcement is the extremity of his property on that side.

I agree with the Sheriff that there is no presumption of that kind. The fact is that for fifty years or so the pursuer or his authors have been in possession of all the ground that lies outside the gable wall itself, as it stands above the ground. The Sheriff has therefore found that the defenders have no right to project their roof beyond the line of the gable wall over any part of the byre which has been possessed by the pursuer. I think that the Sheriff is right, and that we must find to the same effect.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The facts of this case are plain enough. The pursuer has a byre which is enclosed by four walls, of which the defender's gable is one, and the pursuer and his authors have possessed the whole area within this enclosure for more than the prescriptive period upon a sufficient title. In these circumstances it is, I think, impossible to doubt that the pursuer is the proprietor of all that area.

The scarcement stones of the defender's gable are within the area of the byre, and the defender relies on this fact as proving that the line of these stones is the boundary. At the best, there is a mere presumption which, in

I believe this to be a common practice, and I may refer to the case of Leonard and Others v. Lindsay & Benzie, 13 R. 959, as an illustration of it. This view of what was the boundary between the properties is further confirmed by the fact, that when the pursuer's predecessors came to build, they built close up to the east face of the defender's east gable, and in fact rested their house upon that gable, and that has been the state of matters for more than forty years, and I think it constitutes possession by the pursuer and his authors of the ground up to the line of the east face of the east gable of the defender's old house for that period, and as the titles fall to be interpreted by possession, I hold that the boundary line between the two properties is the line of the east face of the east gable of the defender's old house. There is no dispute that the defender's proposed roof will project over the line, and I have granted interdict against the operations to that effect. . . ."

Houston v.
M'Laren.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the projection of the defender's roof from his gable wall over the roof of the pursuer's byre is an invasion of the pursuer's property. The defender justifies his action on the ground that the projection complained of is not carried beyond the line of the scarcement stones which he says is the boundary of his property. He asks us to assume that there is a presumption that when he built his house he kept his gable within the line of his feu. In my opinion there is no such presumption. I cannot say whether the defender, in building his house, went to the verge of his property or not, but it is certain that the pursuer's byre, which extends eastwards from the gable of the defender's house, has been in the occupation of the pursuer and his authors on a habile title for fifty years. In these circumstances I think he must be regarded as the proprietor of the solum east of the gable, including the ground on which the scarcement stands. I think there has been an infringement of the pursuer's right, and that he is entitled to our judgment.

Ross's Trustees v. Ross.

Succession—Vesting—Effect of widow's repudiation of testamentary annuity.
—A testator by his settlement left his widow an annuity of £50, to continue so long as she remained unmarried and to be in full satisfaction of her legal rights, and further directed his trustees "on the death or second marriage of my said wife" to realise the residue of the estate and to pay it over to certain relatives in certain proportions, with a conditional institution of issue and a clause of survivorship, it being expressly declared that "the interests of the residuary legatees shall vest in them at and only upon the arrival of the period when the residue of my estate falls to be realised and divided."

The widow repudiated the settlement and took her legal rights.

The institutes under the residue clause having thereupon called on the trustees to denude of the residue in their favour, or at all events to pay them the income thereof as it accrued, held (dub. Lord Young) that the widow's repudiation of the settlement did not accelerate the period of vesting of the residue, and consequently that the trustees were not entitled under the residue clause to pay over either the capital or the income until the death or the second marriage of the widow.

Ross's Trustees
v. Ross.

2D DIVISION.

DOUGLAS ROSS, feuar, Ranton, died on 23d March 1892, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 2d October 1889. By this deed the testator conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and after providing for payment of debts, and leaving certain legacies payable within six months of his death, he in the third place directed his trustees to pay to his widow "an annuity of £50 sterling per annum during all the years of her life so long as she continues to remain my widow, which sum of £50 sterling per annum . . . shall be held to be in full satisfaction to her of all claims she may have against my estate: And in the event of my said wife marrying again, said annuity of £50 sterling shall be discontinued." The testator then in the fourth place provided,—“Fourthly, on the death or second marriage of my said wife, I direct and appoint my trustees to realise the whole residue and remainder of my estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, and to pay and divide the same between my nephew William Ross, son of my late brother William Ross, designer, who resided in Bridgeton, Glasgow, who shall be entitled to one half, and the other half shall be equally divided among the said Charles Ross, John Ross, and Jessie Ross, the children of my late brother John Ross [to whom legacies of £50 each had been given], and in the event of the said William Ross dying before the period of payment, which shall be the period of vesting, not leaving lawful issue, then the whole residue of my estate shall fall to and be divided equally among the said Charles Ross, John Ross, and Jessie Ross, and the survivors or survivor of them and their respective issue, the issue in each case being entitled to the share which their parent would have been entitled to on survivance: And I provide and declare that the interests of the residuary legatees shall vest in them at and only upon the arrival of the period when the residue of my estate falls to be realised and divided.”

The testator was survived by his widow, and by William Ross, John Ross, and Jessie Ross (Mrs Stoney), mentioned in the fourth purpose. Charles Ross, the other nephew there mentioned, predeceased the testator without issue.

Mrs Ross, the widow, repudiated her husband's settlement and claimed her legal rights, and the amount to which she was legally entitled was paid to her. William Ross, John Ross, and Mrs Stoney then called on the trustees to denude in their favour of the estate remaining after satisfying the other purposes of the trust and the widow's legal claims. The trustees having declined to do this without the sanction of the Court, a special case was presented. The parties were (1) the trustees, and (2) William Ross, John Ross, and Mrs Stoney.

The questions in law were,—“1. Are the second parties, in respect that the testator's widow has claimed her legal rights, entitled now, and without waiting till the death or second marriage of the testator's said widow, to have the residue of the testator's estate divided and paid to them in the proportions provided by his said trust-disposition and settlement? 2. If the trustees are bound to hold until the death or second marriage of the truster's widow, are the said residuary legatees entitled to periodical payment of the income thereof until the occurrence of such death or second marriage, or must it be accumulated?”

At the date of the case the widow was still alive and had not married a second time.

The first parties maintained that they were bound to hold the residue, and to accumulate the income thereof, for the benefit of such of the residuary legatees as might be alive at the period of division fixed by the testator, viz., until either the death or the second marriage of his widow.¹ No. 179.

The second parties maintained that as the testator's widow had claimed, and had been paid, her legal rights, the residue vested in them a morte testatoris, or at anyrate that the period of vesting and payment arrived when the widow claimed her legal rights. Alternatively, the second parties maintained that if not entitled to payment of the capital they were at all events entitled to payment of the income periodically as it accrued.

After a hearing the case was, on the suggestion of the Court, amended so as to include the children of William Ross and of Mrs Jessie Ross or Stoney as parties of the third part, and a curator ad litem was appointed to them.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In view of the case of Muirhead, 17 R. (H. L.) 45, I do not think that we can dispose of the first question otherwise than by deciding that the term of payment has not arrived.

As to the second question, I am of opinion that the income must be held to be in the same position as the capital. The first alternative of the question must be answered in the negative, and the second in the affirmative.

LORD YOUNG.—I do not think that the case is by any means unattended with difficulty. I should rather have been disposed, irrespective of the authority of the cases of Muirhead, 17 R. (H. L.) 45, and Hughes, 19 R. (H. L.) 33, to think that the payment was postponed till the death or the second marriage of the widow, only because the death and the second marriage of the widow were contemplated by the testator as the only possible events which would terminate her annuity in the event of her surviving him. These two dates could not have been fixed upon by the testator with any intelligent purpose of determining the particular relatives who were to take the capital, because the two events have no connection with the determination of such a matter. The only intelligible explanation of these periods having been taken as fixing the terms of payment to the residuary legatees, is, that the testator knew that on either of them his estate would be available for division, and unburdened of the annuity which exhausted the income. But there was a third possible event which would leave the estate free for division—and it is the event which has actually occurred,—viz., the repudiation of the provision by the widow, and her acceptance of her legal rights; and the question which we have to consider is, whether that event has not the same effect in fixing the period of payment as the death or second marriage of the widow would have had.

It is suggested that the amount required to satisfy the legal rights of the wife will make a hole in the estate which might be filled up by accumulating the income during her lifetime. But the amount of filling up would depend upon whether the widow married a second husband or not, as the moment she married again the period of distribution would have arrived. I therefore think that it is impossible to suppose that the testator in fixing the death or second marriage of his widow as the period of distribution intended thereby to determine who were to be the objects of his bounty. I should have been disposed to think that it was clear to ordinary understanding that the postponement of the division of the estate to the two periods named was made in order to secure the payment of the annuity and for no other purpose. I can conceive no other. If, therefore,

No. 179. the only purpose which the testator had in view in naming these two periods was to leave the estate in the hands of the trustees so long as the annuity was to be paid, then I should have thought that as soon as that purpose was satisfied the estate ought to be distributed. That is, I think, the good sense of the thing, and for my part I should also be disposed to hold that it is the law, the law generally being supposed to be in accordance with good sense. But your Lordships think that the case is ruled by prior decisions, and if that be so I think that we must follow these authorities.

Ross's Trustees v. Ross.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think that the case of Muirhead is an absolute rule, and we must follow it.

I am not at all sure that the testator did not mean to make the period of distribution depend upon the second marriage of his widow. It is evident that if she took her annuity there could be no vesting during her lifetime so long as she remained unmarried, but the moment she married a second time the term of payment arrived. So by the very form of the deed the period of distribution depends on the second marriage of the widow.

Process—Interlocutory judgment—Reclaiming Note—Court of Session Ad, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), secs. 27, 28, and 54.—In an action of accounting the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor closing the record and allowing a proof. Thereafter an interlocutor was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary making a remit to a man of skill to report on certain objections to the account lodged by the defenders. Held that this interlocutor was not an interlocutor pronounced under sec. 27 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, and could not be reclaimed against without leave of the Lord Ordinary.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

IN 1889 the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company raised an action of count, reckoning, and payment against George Villiers Mann, S.S.C., and William Hamilton Beattie, architect, and on 9th July 1889 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor closing the record and allowing parties a proof. After sundry procedure the pursuers lodged objections to certain accounts which had been stated by the defenders, and on 20th March 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Of consent, remits to John Wilson Brodie, C.A., Edinburgh, to report on objections, 3 . . . with power to him to call for further production, and to examine havers so far as necessary; and remits also to C. W. Campion, taxing-master of the House of Commons, to report on objection 11, with instructions to distinguish, in the latter case, any charges not incident to the promotion of the pursuers' Act."*

The pursuers, within six days of the date when the interlocutor was signed, but without leave of the Lord Ordinary, presented a reclaiming No. 180. note.

The defenders objected to the competency of the reclaiming note, and argued;—The leave of the Lord Ordinary should have been obtained. The interlocutor reclaimed against was not within the scope of sec. 27 of the Court of Session Act, 1868.* The reclaiming note, therefore, was not under sec. 28, and being without leave was incompetent by sec. 54.

Argued for the pursuers;—The interlocutor in question was virtually an interlocutor allowing proof, and against such an interlocutor a reclaiming note was competent without leave of the Lord Ordinary.¹ The Lord Ordinary by a previous interlocutor had fixed that the remit should be to an engineer, and consent had been given to the remit to Mr Campion inadvertently.

v. Mann.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In the Single Bills notice was taken by the counsel for the respondents in the reclaiming note that this reclaiming note was in his judgment incompetent, and we sent the case to the Roll, reserving that objection. That objection falls now to be disposed of. In my opinion it is well founded. The reclaiming note is presented without leave of the Lord Ordinary, and that raises the question whether it is a reclaiming note falling under the 28th section of the Court of Session Act, 1868; because, if it is not, then it is excluded by the 54th section of that Act as being without leave.

Now, the question whether it is a reclaiming note under section 28 seems to me to be very easily decided. Section 28 provides that any interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary under the 27th section shall be reclaimable without leave within six days of its date. I have stated it shortly, but that is the substance of the provision. Accordingly, unless this interlocutor is an interlocutor pronounced under section 27, this reclaiming note against it is not competent under section 28. Now, the broad facts of this case seem to preclude the idea that this is an interlocutor under section 27. Section 27 is dealing with that stage of the case at which the record is being closed, and the future procedure in the case determined. At that stage parties are allowed to reclaim against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary without leave. But then we find that, in the present case, so long ago as 1889, the closing of the record

* Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), sec. 27,—“The Lord Ordinary shall, at the time of closing the record, require the parties then to state whether they are ready to renounce further probation. . . . If the parties shall not agree to renounce farther probation the Lord Ordinary shall appoint the cause to be debated, . . . and the Lord Ordinary, after hearing parties, shall . . . determine whether farther probation should be allowed.” The section then enumerates the various interlocutors which the Lord Ordinary may pronounce at this stage with reference to probation.

Sec. 28.—“Any interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, as provided for in the preceding section, . . . shall be final, unless within six days from its date the parties, or either of them, shall present a reclaiming note against it. . . .”

Sec. 54.—“Except in so far as otherwise provided by the 28th section hereof, until the whole cause has been decided in the Outer-House, it shall not be competent to present a reclaiming note against any interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary without his leave first had and obtained, but where such leave has been obtained, a reclaiming note presented before the whole cause has been decided in the Outer-House may be lodged within ten days from the date of the interlocutor granting leave. . . .”

stage of the case was reached and passed, and the Lord Ordinary in actually closing the record pronounced an interlocutor sending the whole cause to probation. It seems to me that that was the first, the last, and only interlocutor reclaimable under section 28 of the Court of Session Act in this case. It is true that the interlocutor reclaimed against is about the mode of ascertaining certain facts, but it may very well happen that, in the incidental stages of a case, which has gone to proof and been judged of after proof, there will arise certain matters of detail to be ascertained, and that is just the kind of occasion when it seems very proper that the leave of the Lord Ordinary should be required before another appeal is taken to the Inner-House. But while the reason of the Act, applied to cases which have somewhat detailed procedure, is entirely sound, the direct and conclusive ground for refusing this reclaiming note is that, on the terms of sections 28 and 27 compared with section 54 of the Act, this is not a reclaiming note under section 28.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD M'LAREN.—If I had been considering the question of practice which the Lord Ordinary has disposed of, I should not have hesitated as to making a remit to Mr Campion,—if I believed him to be the most suitable person,—without asking the consent of parties, because in the previous interlocutor the direction to remit to an engineer is merely administrative, and a proposal to remit to an unnamed person can never fetter the discretion of the Court when the actual remit comes to be made. But I agree with your Lordship that this reclaiming note is not competent, because the leave of the Lord Ordinary has not been obtained as required by the statute. I mention my impression about the authority of the Lord Ordinary, in order that the pursuers may not think that they have suffered any prejudice by the circumstance that their agent had not taken the necessary step to obtain the leave of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship.

THE COURT sustained the objection, and refused the reclaiming note.

DRUMMOND'S JUDICIAL FACTOR, Petitioner.—Sym.
WILLIAM INMAN, Compeerer.—Dickson—Clyde.

Judicial Factor—Powers—Sale of heritage not in accordance with authority of Court—Petition for approval of sale—Nobile officium.—A judicial factor having obtained power from the Court to expose certain heritable subjects for sale by public roup at the upset price of £9750, and if not sold, to re-expose the subjects at a reduced upset price, or to sell the same by private bargain at a price not less than the sum at which they had been publicly exposed for sale, sold the subjects before exposing them by public roup to a private purchaser for £9800. The property was bonded much above its value, and the postponed bondholders approved of the sale. Petition for approval of the sale refused.

Opinions that it was competent for the Court to approve of such a sale.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

By trust-disposition, dated 13th January 1891, the firm of Drummond Brothers and the late George Drummond, sole partner of the firm at that date, conveyed to James Martin, C.A., as trustee for behoof of creditors, their whole estates, heritable and moveable, with power to him to sell the same either by public roup or private bargain, as he might think fit. Mr Martin died in January 1893, and at that date the estate consisted of, inter alia, heritable property situated in George Street and Wardie Road, No. 181. Edinburgh.

On 14th April 1893 a judicial factor was appointed, and he having petitioned the Court for authority to sell the heritable subjects, the Lord Ordinary remitted to the Accountant of Court to report. The Accountant of Court having remitted to Mr H. J. Blanc, architect, Edinburgh, to value and report upon the said properties, Mr Blanc valued the subjects in George Street at £9750, and those in Wardie Road at £35.

On 19th October 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Grants warrant to and authorises the judicial factor to expose for sale by public roup, after due advertisement, the subjects and others specified and described first and second in the prayer of the petition, at the upset price of £9750 for the subjects first described, and at the upset price of £35 for the subjects second described in the prayer of the petition; and if not sold at or above said upset prices, to re-expose the same for sale by public roup, after due advertisement, at such reduced upset price or prices as the Accountant of Court may fix, or to sell same by private bargain at prices not less than those at which they had been publicly exposed for sale."

The subjects were afterwards duly advertised, but before they were exposed for sale by public roup the judicial factor received and accepted a private offer, and sold the property in George Street at the price of £9800 to William Inman.

Difficulties having arisen as to the purchaser's title, the judicial factor applied to the Court for approval of the sale. He produced an opinion of the Accountant of Court, which bore,—“The property was bonded much above its value, and the postponed bondholders approved of the sale. Mr Blanc, by letter dated 11th May 1894—and produced—states that the factor acted judiciously in accepting the private offer. The Accountant is of opinion that the factor's acting in selling by private bargain may be approved of.” He also produced letters from the postponed heritable creditors approving of the sale, and a letter from Mr Blanc stating that he had acted judiciously in accepting the private offer. The Lord Ordinary reported the case to the Inner-House.*

* “OPINION.—The petitioner is judicial factor upon a trust-estate. In May 1893 he obtained authority from the Court to sell certain house property in George Street, Edinburgh, belonging to the trust, by public roup, at the upset price of £9750; and if the property was not sold at or above that price to re-expose it for sale at such reduced upset price as the Accountant might fix, or to sell the property by private bargain at a price not less than that at which it had previously been publicly exposed.

“The petitioner, before he had exposed the property for sale by public roup, received a private offer to purchase it at the price of £9800. He accepted the offer, and has now presented the present application for approval of the sale. The Accountant of Court reports in favour of the application being granted.

“The purchaser appeared, and referred to a judgment of the First Division in petition Clyne, 5th June 1894, 21 R. 849, in which it was held that although trustees might obtain authority from the Court to sell, they could not first conclude a contract of sale and then ask the approval of the Court. The purchaser in this case is quite willing to implement his contract, but he contended that, in view of the decision referred to, it was doubtful whether the Court had power to confirm the sale, and he naturally desires to have an unimpeachable title.

“The parties asked that the case should be reported to the Inner-House, and as it raises a question of importance not only to the parties, but in regard to the administration of trust-estates in the hands of judicial factors, the Lord Ordinary has thought it right to do so.

“There is this distinction between the present case and that of Clyne, that

Argued for the judicial factor;—The sale, though not in conformity with the order of the Lord Ordinary, being at a price higher than the authorised upset price was a judicious transaction for the benefit of the estate, and might be confirmed by the Court. In the case of Clyne,¹ the petitioner had no powers of sale, and the power of the Court was limited by the statute. Here there was no statutory difficulty, and it was within the common law powers of the Court to grant the authority asked.²

William Inman appeared and argued;—The powers granted to the petitioner were limited and conditional; the conditions having been disregarded, the state of matters was the same as if there had been no powers of sale at all. In these circumstances it was incompetent for the Court to grant the petition, and give the purchaser a good title. The case of Clyne applied.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This application raises a point of general importance in the administration of property by a judicial factor. This judicial factor, vested in the heritable property in question, came to the Court and asked for authority to sell the subjects either by public roup or private bargain. Now, the Lord Ordinary, exercising the power of the Court, considered the question whether power to sell should be given, and the further question by what mode that power ought to be exercised in the interest of the estate. The Lord Ordinary had before him all the facts of the case, and on these he came to the decision that public roup was the proper method, and not private sale, at least until the state of the market had been tested by a public exposure. Now, we find that the factor, who had taken this power, did not exercise it, but on the contrary, without ever exposing the subjects for public sale, sold them by private bargain for £9800, a £50 note above the upset price. I cannot say that the difference of price is very impressive, or much distinguishes the sale from one at the upset price. The factor in so acting took upon himself a very grave responsibility. One of the merits of our law with regard to estates under judicial management is that, not merely formally but in fact, no important or extraordinary step can be taken by the factor on his own responsibility, the Court having first to consider the expediency of what is proposed. I regard it as a grave error and a grave departure from proper practice for any officer of the Court to take upon himself to exercise powers which the Court has refused to him.

The next question is, what are we to do now? Is it competent for us to grant the authority which the petitioner asks? I am prepared to assume, and I believe, that this would be within our competency. But then we must first be satisfied that it would be for the interest of the estate that we should take this step. The Lord Ordinary has decided that it was best for the interest of the estate to test the market by a public roup. I have heard nothing to indicate that the Lord Ordinary was wrong, or that a different course would now be right. Nothing has been said to reconcile me to the idea that people wanting to buy this George Street property are too shy to go to an auction. The guarded expressions of the Accountant of Court do not suggest this, and there the trustees had not, before entering into the contract of sale, obtained any authority to sell, while here authority was granted to the judicial factor to sell, and the present application has only been rendered necessary because he did not proceed precisely in terms of the powers which were conferred upon him."

proceed upon the same meagre information which we have now had before us. I see no ground, therefore, in the interests of the estate, for supposing that they will be injured by our adhering to the ordinary and salutary course, and I am for refusing the prayer.

LORD ADAM.—I agree with your Lordship. I do not doubt that it would be competent for us to authorise this sale if special circumstances had been presented to us to make that course desirable. We have heard of no such special circumstances here, and I think that we should not grant the authority asked for. The Court thinks that the proper way to test the market is by public competition. There might be special circumstances, such as the subjects being situated at a distance from any market, in which the Court might in the first instance authorise a sale by private bargain. Here the proper method seems to me to be that which the Court usually orders. We have nothing to justify the course taken in this case, except the authority of Mr Blanc. I do not doubt the competency of Mr Blanc, but his authority does not seem to me to be conclusive. It has not been brought out that the estate will suffer by the ordinary course being followed, but whether that should happen or not, I think that the matter ought to be tested in the usual way.

Cessio—Diligence—Diligence of prior creditors against property acquired by debtor after decree of cessio—Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 9, subsec. 5.—Held (by a Court of seven Judges) that although, in a process of cessio, a debtor has been decreed to execute a disposition omnium bonorum in favour of a trustee for behoof of his creditors, individual creditors are entitled to do diligence for the recovery of their debts against property acquired by the debtor after the date of the decree.

Reid v. M'Bain, 17 R. 757, and Calderhead v. Freer and Dobbie, 17 R. 1098, commented on.

ON 7th December 1888, in a petition for cessio bonorum at the instance of George W. Rae, a creditor of the debtor, a decree was pronounced, in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, ordaining the debtor, George Reid, grocer in Loanhead, to execute a disposition omnium bonorum in favour of C. J. Munro, C.A., as trustee for behoof of his creditors.

In 1893 David Graham, baker, Penicuik, who held a Debts Recovery Act decree against Reid for £14, 19s. 4d., and dated 1st October 1888, used arrestments on that decree in the hands of Reid's employers, viz., the Shotts Iron Company, Limited, by whom Reid was employed at a weekly wage of £1, 4s., and the treasurer of the Free Church at Loanhead, where Reid was church-officer at a salary of £6 a-year.

Reid then, on 14th September, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh for recall of the arrestments, and for decree for £100 as damages for the illegal use of diligence.

At the date of the action the pursuer had not obtained his discharge under the Cessio Acts; and it further appeared from the statements of the parties that the trustee named in the decree of cessio had declined to accept office, that the decree had not been extracted, and that no procedure had taken place in the cessio.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The arrestments complained of being directed against wages and earnings of the pursuer due to him subsequent to the date of the said decree of cessio bonorum, and which are therefore protected from diligence for debt incurred by the pursuer prior thereto, are wrongful and illegal, and should be recalled, as craved.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(5) The process of cessio not being like sequestration, a universal diligence does not protect acquirenda by the debtor from the diligence of his prior creditors, and the arrestments complained of having been used for the purpose of attaching subsequent earnings of the pursuer, legally attachable, the same ought not to be recalled.

On 24th November 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Rutherford) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer's earnings and emoluments subsequent to the date of the decree of cessio bonorum, referred to on record, are not by the said decree protected from the diligence of creditors whose debts were incurred prior thereto; therefore repels the pursuer's second plea in law, and, to the effect mentioned, sustains the defender's fifth plea in law," &c.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Blair), on 20th December, recalled that interlocutor, in effect sustained a plea stated by the defender that the decree of cessio not having been extracted was no bar to the arrestments; and assoilzied the defender.

The pursuer appealed.

After a hearing on the appeal the Court (THE LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD TRAYNER) appointed the cause to be heard before the Judges of the Division, along with three Judges of the First Division.

The question argued before the seven Judges was the general question raised by the pleas in law for the parties above quoted.

Argued for the pursuer;—Under the former law of cessio bonorum, it was not disputed that individual creditors might use diligence against their debtor so as to attach acquirenda, although their debts were contracted prior to the date of the cessio, but the effect of the Acts of 1880 and 1881 * was to put a decree of cessio into the same position in this

* The statutory provisions were:—

The Act regulating the process of Cessio Bonorum, &c., 1836 (6 and 7 Will. IV. cap. 56), enacts, sec. 16,—“And be it enacted that the decree pronounced by the Inner-House or by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, or by the Sheriff, granting the benefit of cessio bonorum, shall operate as an assignation of the debtor's moveables in favour of any trustee mentioned in the decree for behoof of the creditors, provided always that it shall be optional to the creditors to require the debtor to execute a disposition omnium bonorum, as has been hitherto granted in processes of cessio before the Court of Session in favour of the trustee, the expense of which deed shall be paid out of the readiest of the funds thereby conveyed.”

The Debtors Act, 1880 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 34), enacts, sec. 7,—“Any matter as a sequestration, so that individual creditors whose debts were earlier in date than the decree of cessio could no longer use diligence. Only the trustee in the cessio could attach acquirenda of the debtor. That was the opinion of the late Lord President and of Lord Shand. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—What is the title of the trustee to attach acquirenda? The Act says that the decree shall operate as an assignation of the debtor's moveables. Does not that mean only the moveables belonging to him at the date of the decree?] If that was so, the trustee could petition for a second cessio, and thereby attach acquirenda of the debtor.² The decree of cessio did not discharge the debts of prior creditors, it merely took away from the creditors the right to use separate diligence. The defender's arrestments ought therefore to be recalled.

Graham.

Argued for the defender;—It being admitted that under the old law of cessio acquirenda of the debtor were not protected from the diligence of individual creditors, the question was whether that state of the law had been altered by the recent Acts of 1880 and 1881. Now, these Acts did not expressly take away the right of individual creditors to do diligence against acquirenda, nor was there any enactment similar to sec. 103 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856, giving the trustee a title to recover debtor who is notour bankrupt within the meaning of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 [19 and 20 Vict. c. 79], or of this Act, may present a petition for decree of cessio bonorum, in the same manner and subject to the same provisions and conditions, as nearly as may be, in and subject to which a person now entitled to apply for decree of cessio bonorum may do so under the Acts of Parliament enumerated in the schedule hereto annexed, hereinafter called the Cessio Acts [6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56; 39 and 40 Vict. c. 70, sec. 26], and the provisions of the Cessio Acts shall apply, as nearly as may be, to such petition and the procedure thereunder, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained."

Sec. 8.—"Any creditor of a debtor who is notour bankrupt within the meaning of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, or of this Act, may present a petition to the Sheriff of the county in which such debtor has his ordinary domicile, setting forth that he (the debtor) is unable to pay his debts, and praying that he may be decerned to execute a disposition omnium bonorum for behoof of his creditors, and that a trustee be appointed who shall take the management and disposal of his estate for such behoof, and such process shall be taken and deemed to be a process of cessio. . . ."

Sec. 9.—"On such petition being presented the following provisions shall have effect:— . . . 5. Until the debtor shall execute a disposition omnium bonorum for behoof of his creditors, any decree decerning him to do so shall operate as an assignation of his moveables in favour of any trustee mentioned in the decree for behoof of such creditors. . . ."

The Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 22), enacts, sec. 5,—"A debtor with respect to whom decree of cessio bonorum has been pronounced shall be entitled, on the expiration of six months from the date of such decree, to apply to the Sheriff to be finally discharged of all debts contracted by him before the date of such decree, and the provisions of the 146th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, with regard to the conditions on which a bankrupt shall be entitled to obtain his discharge on the expiration of six months, twelve months, eighteen months, and two years respectively, from the date of sequestration shall apply to debtors with respect to whom decree of cessio bonorum has been pronounced. A deliverance by the Sheriff granting, postponing, or refusing a discharge under this section shall be final, and not subject to review."

acquirenda. The only enactment bearing on the point was sec. 9, subsec. 5 of the Act of 1880, which declared that the decree of cessio should operate as an assignation of the debtor's moveables in favour of the trustee; but in that enactment, according to its natural construction, "moveables" meant only moveables belonging to the debtor at the date of the decree; and further, the enactment was in its terms practically identical with sec. 16 of the Act of 1836, which latter section, the pursuer conceded, did not give the trustee a title to acquirenda. If, therefore, neither the trustee nor individual creditors had a title to attach acquirenda the practical effect of a decree of cessio was to discharge the debtor of all debts existing at its date, and the provisions of sec. 16 of the Act of 1881, giving the debtor a right to obtain discharge on certain conditions, would be rendered nugatory. The opinions of the Lord President and Lord Shand in the cases cited by the pursuer were obiter, and were adverse to an opinion expressed by the late Lord President in Simpson v. Jack.¹

LORD YOUNG.—The question which has been argued before us is a general one, and it is this,—Whether a decree in a petition for cessio in the terms of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of 7th December 1888 protects the estate of the debtor,—that is to say, estate which he has acquired subsequent to the decree,—from the diligence of creditors to whom he had incurred debts before the date of the decree in the application for cessio.

The estate before us in this case is a simple enough one; it amounts only to the earnings of the petitioner, some 24s. weekly, and in addition a small wage which he has as church-officer in a dissenting church, but the general question which was argued before us is altogether irrespective of the nature or extent of the estate, and it is as I have stated.

Both Sheriffs have decided that it is not so protected, but a doubt as to the correctness of this decision has arisen by reason of certain obiter dicta by the late Lord President and Lord Shand in two cases—Calderhead v. Freer and Dobbie, July 9, 1890, 17 R. 1098; Reid v. M'Bain, May 16, 1890, 17 R. 757. But giving all respect and weight to these dicta, I have come without any doubt or difficulty to be of opinion that a decree granting cessio affords no such protection as the pursuer in this action has contended for.

As far as I know, it has never been held that diligence used against a debtor's estate prior to his application for cessio becomes bad when he makes that application, and I know of no authority or principle for holding that it does so. Under our old law,—and the old law still exists, with, as I think, a single unimportant change,—unimportant at least with reference to the present question,—the process of cessio existed solely for the personal protection of the debtor, and proceeded upon this perfectly intelligible view, that where an honest man was prepared to hand over, and did actually hand over, his whole estate to his creditors, his person ought to be protected against incarceration, and if he was in prison that he ought to be liberated. But the decree of cessio gave him no discharge of his debts against his creditors. His creditors remained in just the same position as if no decree of cessio had been applied for or granted. They took all the estates which he surrendered to them, but in so far as their debts were unpaid they retained all the rights which they ever had against all his estate, whether it had existed before his application or had been acquired afterwards. No. 182.

Now, by a change in the law introduced by a recent statute, standing upon a very intelligible and convenient consideration, a debtor who has given up his whole estate for the benefit of his creditors may apply to the Sheriff for his discharge, and very large discretion is given to the Sheriff in considering whether he shall grant or refuse the discharge, or delay it or allow it in modified terms. If it appears that the debtor has given up his whole estate, and that it has been realised and distributed among his creditors, the Sheriff may grant the debtor his discharge in the cessio process, and the expense and delay necessary to obtain a discharge in a proper sequestration is thereby avoided in this small class of cases. The debtor is discharged as effectually as if he had been discharged in a sequestration, and is thus enabled to begin business again. That is the only change that has been made in the law of cessio, and it does not seem to me to be pertinent to the question before us.

Reid v.
Graham.

If the pursuer here is in a position to present an application to the Sheriff, and to say that according to the true meaning and spirit of the change which has been wrought by the Statute of 1881 he is entitled to get his discharge, he may do so, and if he is able to persuade the Sheriff to give him his discharge, then those persons who were his creditors before he applied for cessio will not be able to do diligence against any estate he may acquire after obtaining his discharge. But it seems that he is not in a position to make such an application, and he argues that it is not necessary for him to make it, because he says that the law as it has existed since the Act of 1881 protects from the diligence of creditors property which a debtor may acquire after the date of the decree granting cessio. That is not, in my view, the true meaning of the Act. I know of no authority or principle upon which the proposition for which the pursuer contends can be maintained, and accordingly I am of opinion that the defender should be assolizied.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—The question argued to us really comes to this, whether a decree of cessio bonorum when pronounced by the Sheriff operates as a perpetual restraint upon diligence at the instance of prior creditors, because if creditors are to be restrained in this way during the subsistence of the process of cessio, and until the debtor is discharged, it is evident that the right to use diligence for debts preceding the cessio bonorum can never be revived. The proposition, in fact, comes to this, that the pronouncing of the decree of cessio and the surrender by the debtor of his whole means and estate eo ipso discharges the debts which the debtor had incurred up to that time, and puts it out of the power of the creditors to recover the unpaid part of their claims out of his future acquisitions.

It was conceded that no rule of law preventing creditors from using diligence existed prior to the passing of the Debtors Act of 1881.

A process of cessio bonorum was merely a mode of obtaining protection for the person of the debtor from imprisonment for debt. The only legitimate reason for putting the debtor in prison was to compel him to make over his estate to his creditors, and therefore if the debtor were willing to make a surrender, and if the creditors were satisfied that he had handed over his whole estate, and came forward and said so, it was thought right that the power of the creditors to imprison their debtor should cease. It was never intended that the action of the debtor in giving up his present estate should debar his creditors from using diligence for the unpaid part of their claims against future acquisitions.

If I am right in my view of the effect of the process of cessio, it is clear that the Acts of 1880 and 1881 made no change in the process, except that it gave creditors a title to petition. The effect of the decree of cessio remained unaltered, because by the 5th and 6th clauses of the Bankruptcy and Cessio Act, 1881, it is provided that a debtor may within six months after the date of the decree apply to the Sheriff to be discharged of all debts contracted by him before the date of the decree. But if the effect of the decree of cessio were to put an end to the right of a prior creditor to use diligence against estate of the debtor subsequently acquired, this discharge would, to say the least, be a very useless proceeding.

It was said that the proper person to do diligence against any estate of the debtor for debts incurred before the decree was the trustee. I doubt very much if the trustee in a cessio has any right to attach estate which has come into the hands of the debtor after the decree of cessio. I think his duty is solely to ingather and distribute the estate of the debtor which he takes under the disposition omnium bonorum.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely agree. I do not think that I or either of my brethren who were sitting in this Division of the Court when the case was first heard had any doubt about the decision which ought to be pronounced, but sitting as we then were, a Court of three Judges, and having in view the opinions expressed in former cases by the late Lord President and Lord Shand, we did not think it right to decide the present question without the assistance of your Lordships.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having, along with three Judges of the First Division of the Court, heard counsel for the parties on the appeal, do, in terms of the opinions of the Judges present, recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff appealed against, assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the petition, and decern: Find the defender entitled to expenses," &c.

COMMISSIONERS OF THE BURGH OF LOCKERBIE, Defenders (Reclaimers).—D. Anderson.

Statute—Police Commissioners—Gas—Burgh Gas Supply (Scotland) Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 49), secs. 38 and 41.—The Burgh Gas Supply (Scotland) Act, 1876, sec. 41, enacts,—“The commissioners shall from time to time fix the price to be paid for gas to be supplied during any succeeding year . . . provided that the price shall be such as will, as nearly as can be estimated, raise sufficient income to discharge all the costs . . . incident to the manufacture and distribution of the gas made, together with the interest on all money borrowed in respect of the works” No. 183.

Sec. 38 enacts that the commissioners may levy such a rate, to be termed the “Gas Contingent Guarantee Rate,” as may be required to pay any annuities and the interest of money borrowed under the provisions and for the purposes of the Act. July 4, 1894.
Milne v. Commissioners of Lockerbie.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Low) that gas commissioners are entitled (1) in fixing the price of gas to consider whether a higher or lower rate of charge will yield the greater return, and to adopt such rate as in their judgment will yield the greatest return from gas consumers, if that is necessary to prevent a deficit, and (2) at the same time to impose a guarantee rate to meet an anticipated deficit on the gas account.

In 1891 the Police Commissioners of the burgh of Lockerbie, in virtue of the powers conferred by the Burgh Gas Supply (Scotland) Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. c. 49), acquired by purchase the whole undertaking of the Lockerbie Gas-Light Company, Limited, and, in connection with the purchase, borrowed on mortgage as provided by the Act. On 9th October 1893, in estimating the price of gas for the current year to 15th May 1894, as provided by section 41 of the Act,* the Commissioners resolved to fix the price at 6s. 3d. per cubic foot, and at the same time to impose a gas contingent guarantee rate of 5d. per £1.† 1st Division.
Lord Low.

On 30th January 1894 Thomas Milne, grain-merchant, along with three other inhabitants of and ratepayers in the burgh of Lockerbie, raised an action against the Commissioners concluding for declarator,—“Primo, that the defenders, in fixing the price of gas to be supplied by them to consumers thereof during any succeeding year or half year, are bound to fix the price of such gas at such a rate as will, as nearly as can be estimated, raise sufficient income to discharge all the costs and expenses of, and incident to, the manufacture and distribution of the gas made,

* The Burgh Gas Supply (Scotland) Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. c. 49), sec. 41, enacts,—“The commissioners shall from time to time fix the price to be paid for gas to be supplied during any succeeding year or half year, and, until such price be altered by the commissioners, the price so fixed shall remain in force, provided that the price shall be such as will, as nearly as can be estimated, raise sufficient income to discharge all the costs and expenses of and incident to the manufacture and distribution of the gas made, together with the interest on all money borrowed in respect of the works, and to provide the sinking fund required by this Act, and to provide for a depreciation and renewal fund sufficient to maintain the works in perpetuity, and for all charges incident to the occupation of such works, and the moneys received in respect of and incident to the manufacture and distribution of gas shall be applied to such purposes only, and any balance at the termination of any year shall be carried to the debit or credit of the succeeding year. . . .”

† Section 38 of the statute is in the following terms:—“It shall be lawful for the commissioners, and they are hereby required from time to time to fix, impose, and levy such a rate, to be termed ‘The Gas Contingent Guarantee Rate,’ as may be required to pay any annuities and any interest due thereon, and the interest of money borrowed or to be borrowed under the provisions and for the purposes of this Act.”

Section 39.—“The Gas Contingent Guarantee Rate shall be imposed, levied, and collected on property situated within the burgh, on the requisition of the commissioners, by the authority in the burgh empowered by law to levy any assessment for police purposes therein, along with and in the same manner in all respects and from the same descriptions of persons and property as such assessment for police purposes, and the amount of such rate, when imposed, levied, and collected by such authority, shall be paid over to the commissioners for the purposes of this Act. . . .”

together with the interest on all money borrowed in respect of the works, and to provide the sinking fund and other charges specified in section 41 of the said Act; and further, and in particular, in such a way, as nearly as can be estimated, as will prevent them, when fixing the price of gas as aforesaid, from designedly fixing the price so as to create a deficiency in such income, to be provided for out of the Gas Contingent Guarantee Rate under said statute, or otherwise than out of the price of gas to be estimated as aforesaid: Secundo, That it is illegal and ultra vires of the defenders to fix, impose, and levy upon and from the pursuers and all others, ratepayers in the burgh of Lockerbie, 'the Gas Contingent Guarantee Rate' specified in the 38th section of the said Act, unless the same is or may be required by the defenders to pay annuities and interest thereon, and interest on money borrowed by them in terms thereof by reason of a deficiency arising during any year or half year succeeding their estimate, after the price of gas has been fixed, as nearly as can be estimated, at such a figure as will pay all the annual charge as aforesaid." They also concluded for reduction of the resolution of 9th October 1893, and for interdict against the defenders collecting the Gas Contingent Guarantee Rate.

The pursuers, after narrating the course of administration followed by the defenders, averred,—(Cond. 15) "The defenders, in estimating the price of gas for the current year to 15th May 1894, which they had under consideration at their meeting held on 9th October 1893, have again informally fixed the price of gas at 6s. 3d. per 1000 cubic feet (being 5d. less than their price for the former years), and as the result of such a reduced price there will be a deficiency on the year's working of at least £320, 16s. 6d. . . . With the ostensible object of providing for the said apparent deficiency of £320, 16s. 6d. estimated in their said statement for the current year, the defenders at their said meeting on 9th October 1893, instead of performing their statutory duty of adjusting the price of gas to meet such apparent deficiency, resolved to impose, for the third time, a Gas Contingent Guarantee Rate, on this occasion of 5d. per £, representing a return upon a rental of £8830, according to the Burgh Valuation-Roll for the current year, of £183, 19s. 2d. Such a sum, the pursuers are led to believe and aver, is, however, intended by the defenders to pay the year's interest upon the said mortgage of £5400, which amounts (less tax) for the current year to £197, 7s. 11d., although they are aware that the moneys received by them from the sale of gas are primarily liable under the statute to meet the same."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defenders, upon a sound construction of the statute libelled, being bound in their yearly estimate to fix the price of gas at such a rate as will discharge all the costs and expenses of and incident to the manufacture and distribution of the gas made, together with the interest due by them on money borrowed in respect of the works, without creating any apparent deficiency, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator to that effect, as craved. (3) The defenders not being entitled to impose the said Gas Contingent Guarantee Rate unless in the event of a deficiency arising after the price of gas has been fixed by them as aforesaid, decree of declarator ought to be pronounced to that effect, as craved.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant. (3) On a sound construction of the statute libelled, the defenders, in fixing the gas rate as above condescended on, have acted strictly within the meaning of the statute, and the pursuers are not entitled to decree in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons. (4) The defenders being entitled, by the powers conferred upon them by the said statute, to levy the said "Gas Contingent Guarantee Rate," and having levied the same in terms thereof, the pursuers are not entitled to decree in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons. No. 183.

On 7th June 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Low) sustained the second and third pleas in law for the pursuers, and decerned in terms of the first and second conclusions of the summons, and granted leave to reclaim.*

Milne v. Commissioners of Lockerbie.

* "OPINION.—The first question in this case is as to the true construction of the 41st section of the Burghs Gas Supply (Scotland) Act, 1876. Reading that section alone, I do not think that it is ambiguous. It makes it imperative upon the Gas Commissioners to fix the price to be paid for gas at such an amount as will, as nearly as can be estimated, raise sufficient income to discharge all the charges mentioned in the section, including the interest on all money borrowed in respect of the works.

"Prima facie, the defenders have not adhered to the provisions of the section, because they have deliberately and intentionally fixed the price at an amount not capable of raising a sufficient income to pay the interest upon money which they have borrowed, as well as the other charges specified in the section.

"The position taken up the defenders is this: They say that the price which they have fixed is that which is calculated to bring in the largest possible income, because, if they made the price higher, many people would not use gas, and the income would fall. They have, they contend, a discretion in the matter, and the words, 'as nearly as can be estimated,' must be read as meaning 'as nearly as can be estimated consistently with the prudent and profitable management of the undertaking.' That construction, they argue, must be put upon the 41st section, when it is read in connection with the 38th section.

"When read alone, it does not appear to me that the 41st section gives any discretion to the Commissioners, or that the words 'as nearly as can be estimated,' admit of the construction for which the defenders contend. It is therefore necessary to consider the terms of the 38th section.

"That section occurs in the part of the statute (from the 27th to the 40th sections, both inclusive) which deals with the 'borrowing powers of Commissioners.' The 27th section authorises the Commissioners to borrow on mortgage any money which may be necessary for the purchase or erection of gas works, and to grant mortgages of any rates or charges leviable by them under the provisions of the Act, in security of the payment of the money so borrowed and interest thereon. Provision is then made by sections 28th to 37th for the form of mortgages and interest warrants, for the appointment of a judicial factor in the event of annuities or interest on borrowed money falling into arrear, for the application of borrowed money and kindred matters. Then the 38th section provides,—'It shall be lawful for the Commissioners, and they are hereby required from time to time to fix, impose, and levy, such a rate, to be termed "The Gas Contingent Guarantee Rate," as may be required to pay any annuities, and any interest due thereon, and the interest of money borrowed or to be borrowed under the provisions, and for the purposes of this Act.'

"That section appears to me to be designed for the security of mortgagees and annuitants. If the price of the gas fixed in terms of the provisions of the 41st section does not produce a sufficient income to meet the interest of borrowed money, as well as the other charges laid upon the income, then, and not till then, the Commissioners are authorised and required to levy the Gas Contingent Guarantee Rate. I arrive at that conclusion because, in the first place, the provisions of the 41st section as to the basis upon which the price of gas is to be fixed are imperative; and, in the second place, the terms in which the 38th section is expressed, and the rate thereby authorised described, appears to me to shew that the rate was only to be levied when required to meet a contingency, the contingency, namely, of the income derived from the sale of the gas not being sufficient to meet the interest upon money borrowed.

"I am therefore of opinion that the defenders in designedly fixing the price

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—Section 41 was not imperative in its terms, but left with the Commissioners a discretion in fixing the price of gas from time to time, so as to obtain the largest yield possible from the consumers. Merely to raise the price might lead to its becoming prohibitive, and so defeat the object of the increase. It was the duty of the Commissioners to consider probable results with a view to the most profitable management of the undertaking. It was not said that they had not carefully considered the matter.

Argued for the respondents;—The Commissioners had no right to levy a guarantee rate to meet a probable deficit. The Act intended that the deficiency should first have arisen. Any apparent or threatened deficit should be met by an increase in the price, otherwise the gas consumer was relieved at the expense of the ratepayer. It was not stated that an increase in the price of the gas would have resulted in a smaller return.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case it is perhaps best first to consider what is the due and statutory administration by the Commissioners of the system set up in the Act of 1876. I take it that it is perfectly clear that the Commissioners are bound, before imposing a guarantee rate, to exhaust the yielding power of their price clause,—that is to say, that they have no right, without making the most they can out of the sale of gas, by raising the price if necessary, to impose a rate. To put it in another way, they have no right to impose the burden of the establishment partly on the consumers and partly on the ratepayers. They must make the most they can out of the concern before they resort to a rate.

But then, while the statute is very imperative, as the Lord Ordinary has said, in the terms of section 41, there is underlying section 41 an element of conjecture or estimate, because, read in a condensed form, section 41 bids the Commissioners, as their first duty, make up their minds what price is likely to yield the largest sum. Now, I take it that this may be a higher price or a lower price, according to the position of the purchasers. If you could count upon every man who pays sixpence continuing to pay a shilling, then it would be a very simple process just to raise the rate, and then you are sure of your return. But the contrary notoriously is the fact, and the word “estimate,” and the duty of estimating imposed upon the Commissioners, seem to me to make it necessary that they should make up their minds not on the mere question whether sixpence or a shilling is the larger sum, but whether a sixpence or a shilling price will bring in the most money.

Now, they may be right or they may be wrong, but they say that they could not raise their price without reducing the yield, because their purchasers would not pay the enhanced price. As I have said, they may be right or they may be wrong upon that, it is not a matter we have anything to do with. The duty we have to see that they have performed is, that they estimate and that they fix the price with reference to the object to be attained, namely, paying the expenses of the establishment out of the price.

Now, when I turn from the consideration of the duty of the Commissioners to what is said on record, I cannot discover a relevant case laid against their administration. If you assume that their duty is the mechanical one of raising the price as often as they find a deficiency, then it is plain sailing—they have done quite wrong. But the pursuer's case seems to leave out of account that there are two factors in the computation of how much will be brought in by the price, and these are not merely the price, but the future number of payers of the price, and in this action, looking at the record from beginning to end, I do not find that these Commissioners are said to have omitted this duty of making up their minds as to the best way of exhausting the yielding power of the price clause.

of gas from year to year at an amount lower than that which they estimated would be required to provide an income sufficient to meet all the charges specified in section 41 acted illegally, and that the pursuers are entitled to have decree in terms of the leading declaratory conclusions of the summons.”

Now, the practical question is whether the laying on of this guarantee rate is to be set aside or not, and it seems to me we could only set it aside if it were either admitted or proved that the price clause had not been worked according to the meaning which I have described. There is no such averment here. On the contrary, Mr Rankine has frankly admitted—he is not in a position to deny—that the Commissioners have fixed the price at what they consider the highest figure to bring in the largest yield. That being so, it seems to me that the case falls to the ground. I think I made it sufficiently clear that, in my opinion, the Commissioners are not entitled to resort to a guarantee rate until the price has produced the largest amount obtainable under the clause.

Having said that, I only desire to add that I think the Lord Ordinary's judgment proceeds upon an omission to observe the defect in the pursuer's case to which I have adverted. His Lordship treats it as if it were to be assumed in this case that the Commissioners had only to raise the price in order to enhance the yield. It seems to me that his Lordship's judgment, while stating a perfectly sound view of the working of the statute, is not maintainable, because he does not bear in view, or his attention was not called to the fact, that the Commissioners here, for all that appears, have applied their minds to the question of how much they can get from the consumers of Lockerbie taken as a whole.

I am therefore for recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and I think the action should be dismissed.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Proof—Onus—Jurisdiction—Sheriff—Judicial Factor.—A, a domestic servant, on the death of her mistress claimed certain pieces of furniture in the house as given to her by her mistress. In a reference made to an arbiter by A and by the judicial factor on the deceased's estate, the former produced a list of furniture in her mistress's handwriting in support of her claim. The arbiter having decided the case against A, the judicial factor refused to return to her the list of furniture. In an action brought by A in the Sheriff Court against the judicial factor for delivery of the writing the Sheriff assoilzied the defender.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of the
Peebles.

IN August 1893 Mary C. Hallpenny, residing at 18 Broughton Place, Edinburgh, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against James Howden, C.A., judicial factor appointed by the Court of Session on the estate of the deceased Miss Sarah Graham Stirling, 27 Queen Street, Edinburgh, in which she prayed the Court for decree against the defender, ordaining him to deliver to her "(first) a writing or document bearing to be a 'list of personal property belonging to Miss Sarah Graham or Graham Stirling, of 27 Queen Street, Edinburgh, and which I now commence 17th May 1878. For Mary Hallpenny or Hall'; and (second) sixteen parchment luggage labels, each having a writing thereon to the effect that the particular article thereon specified was given in gift by the said Miss Sarah Graham or Graham Stirling to the pursuer, and which writing and labels were delivered to the defender as judicial factor foresaid, or to his agents on his behalf, in or about the month of March 1889, to be submitted along with a memorial to the Right Honourable John Blair Balfour, then Dean of Faculty, for his opinion in reference thereto."

The case arose in the following circumstances, as disclosed by the admissions of the parties and by a proof:—The pursuer had for many years prior to Miss Graham Stirling's death been in her service as housekeeper at 27 Queen Street. The furniture in that house, when Miss Graham Stirling came to reside there, was possessed by her in life-tenant merely, but she afterwards, from time to time, bought articles of furniture, and added them to the furniture of the house. Of the furniture so bought Miss Graham Stirling made a list, being the document first described in the prayer of the petition. The heading of the list was in Miss Graham Stirling's own handwriting. Whenever she bought a new article she obtained the list from the pursuer (in whose custody the list usually was), wrote the name of the article in the list, and then returned the list to the pursuer. The labels second referred to in the prayer of the petition were alleged by the pursuer to have been bought for the purpose of being attached to the articles of furniture which had been purchased by Miss Stirling, but they were never so attached.* The labels were not subscribed, and the parties were at issue as to whether the writing on them was Miss Stirling's. The furniture purchased by Miss Stirling was in her use and possession at the time of her death.

After Miss Stirling's death the pursuer, founding upon the documents in question, which were in her possession, claimed the articles of furniture bought by Miss Stirling on the ground that they had been gifted or bequeathed to her. The defender, as judicial factor, declined to admit this claim, and the parties referred the matter to the Dean of Faculty (Mr J. B. Balfour), who determined that the pursuer's claim was untenable. The documents in question were submitted to the Dean of Faculty, along with the memorial, and were returned, along with the Dean's opinion, to the defender, who declined to give them back to the pursuer.

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) The said writing and labels being the property of the pursuer, she is entitled to delivery thereof. (2) The defender having no right to the said documents or to retain possession thereof, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the petition, with expenses. No. 184.

July 4, 1894.
Hallpenny v.
Howden.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) Pursuer's statements are irrelevant. (2) The pursuer has no right, title, or interest.

On 14th May 1894 the Sheriff-substitute (Rutherford) pronounced this interlocutor, after five findings in fact:—"Finds in fact and in law, assuming the documents mentioned in the prayer of the petition to be (as the pursuer alleges) in the handwriting of the late Miss Graham Stirling (1) that the pursuer has failed to shew that she has any right, title, or interest to obtain delivery thereof; and (2) that the defender, as judicial factor on Miss Graham Stirling's estate, is their proper custodian: Therefore assails the defender from the conclusions of the libel, and decerns."

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The pursuer was entitled to recover these documents on the ground that they were her property. They were in her possession at the time of Miss Stirling's death. That raised a presumption that they were the pursuer's property. The mere circumstance that the pursuer had laid them before the arbiter in support of her claim did not entitle the defender to retain them as part of the estate.¹

Argued for the defender;—Looking to the character of these documents, there was no presumption that they belonged to the pursuer. The presumption was that they belonged to the estate of the deceased, and the defender as judicial factor was entitled to retain them unless the pursuer proved that they were her property, which she had failed to do.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The claim of the pursuer here is that the defender should be ordained to deliver up to her sixteen parchment luggage labels, and a list of furniture, which had belonged to Miss Graham Stirling, and had been made up by her. The pursuer claims that these writings should be given up to her as being her property.

Upon a careful consideration of the proof I have come to be of opinion that the pursuer has not established that she ever had any right of property in the writings in question. This lady wrote out a list of the furniture which she bought and gave it into the custody of the pursuer, her servant, and when she bought anything new she used to get the list from the pursuer and write down what she had got, but the list, in my opinion, never became the pursuer's property. Then, as regards the labels, if written by the deceased, they are not in my opinion proved to have been made the property of the pursuer. I think that we must decide the case to the same effect as the Sheriff-substitute has done.

LORD YOUNG.—I am disposed to agree with your Lordship on the question of fact, that the pursuer has not shewn that she has any right of property in the writings which she claims should be delivered up to her, but according to my opinion it is my duty to state that I consider the pursuer's whole proceedings in this case to be incompetent upon general considerations which do not seem to have been raised in the Sheriff Court.

When we appoint a judicial factor upon an estate, we take that estate into our own management, and appoint him as our officer to do all that is necessary for the ingathering and distribution of the estate among the parties having right thereto, he having regard to the rights of all parties who are interested in it. We put this estate into the hands of the defender as judicial factor, and he proceeded to do what he considered to be his duty in ingathering Miss Stirling's estate. Assuming it to be true that he got possession of these articles from the pursuer—who was a servant in the house where all the factorial estate was situated—for the purpose of having it decided whether she was entitled to the furniture, he is nevertheless of opinion—and I agree with him—that he got them into his possession as judicial factor for the purpose of doing his duty as such, and in no other capacity, and that he is entitled to retain them.

There is no doubt that a judicial factor may recover writings or property from others in such circumstances as to make it his duty to restore them to the persons from whom he got them when his purpose was served, but that would be a matter for him to determine in the first instance, and upon his own responsibility, and if there were grounds for saying that the circumstances under which he had acquired them did not warrant him in keeping them as judicial factor, that would be a question for our judgment, as he is an officer of our Court, and for the judgment of no other. We might have come to the conclusion that it was his duty as our officer not to retain them, but to hand them back to the person from whom he got them, or we might have arrived at a contrary result, but at anyrate it would be for anyone desiring the return of such writings to appeal to us as his master and superior in the matter to give him instructions how to act. Therefore an action like this in the Sheriff Court against an officer of Court to compel him to give up documents which he thinks it according to his duty as judicial factor to retain, is, in my opinion, utterly incompetent.

There is another ground upon which I think we ought to dismiss this case which I think I ought to state, and it is this, that where, as in the present case, there is manifestly no interest in the property sought to be recovered, the labels with writing on them being of no use whatever as property, although no doubt they might be of use as evidence in some other action, I do not think it is reasonable that we should be called upon to adjudicate upon the question whether they are property or not. The documents sought to be recovered in this action are safe in the possession of the judicial factor, and he thinks perhaps they might not be so safe elsewhere.

I am of opinion upon all these grounds that the pursuer in this action has taken up a most untenable position, and that the action ought to be dismissed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The documents in question were given by the pursuer to the judicial factor in support of a claim she made for certain articles which belonged to the late Miss Graham Stirling. They were given for the determination of that question alone. After that question was settled, it was, I think, the duty of the factor to return them to the pursuer, unless he was able to shew that he had a right to retain them.

I think, therefore, that this case is to be determined as if it were an action by the judicial factor against the present pursuer for recovery of the documents. I am satisfied that the judicial factor is entitled to retain them. There is no proof that they belong to the pursuer. They were in the house of the deceased at her death, and I think that they belonged to her.

LORD TRAYNER.—This case is based upon the allegation that the articles sought to be recovered are the property of the pursuer, and the defence is that they are not her property, and that she has no right, title, or interest in them. No. 184.

I agree in thinking that the pursuer has failed to establish her alleged right of property, and am prepared to sustain the defence to which I have referred, and July 4, 1894.

Succession—Trust—Testamentary annuity to widow less Government annuity and increase in latter after death of testator—Bona fide percepta et consumpta.—In an antenuptial contract of marriage the husband bound himself to make such contributions as were necessary to secure to his widow the usual annuity from the Bombay Civil Fund, and in the event of his widow not being entitled from any cause to such annuity he bound himself and his heirs to pay to her an annuity of £300.

The husband predeceased his wife, and left a trust-disposition and settlement by which he, inter alia, directed his trustees to pay to his widow an annuity of £300 "in addition to what she is entitled to under" the contract of marriage, "my intention being that the said" widow "shall have a free annuity of £600 under the said marriage-contract and these presents, any annuity she may receive from the Bombay Civil Fund being imputed to account thereof"; under the declaration that in the event of his widow "from any cause losing or not receiving from the Bombay Civil Fund the usual annuity of Indian civil servants, she shall only be entitled to a free annuity of £500 from my own proper funds, to which sum her annuity under said marriage-contract and these presents shall in that event be restricted."

The amount of the annuity payable from the Bombay Civil Fund to the widow at her husband's death in 1876 was £300, and she accordingly received £300 a-year more from her husband's testamentary trustees. In 1882 the Bombay Civil Fund annuity was by Act of Parliament increased by a pension of £60 a-year. The husband's representatives continued to pay to the widow an additional £300 a-year until 1894, when the question arose whether the additional sum ought to be £240 a-year only in respect that she was receiving the additional pension of £60 a-year.

A special case was presented by the widow and her husband's representatives, in which it was admitted that they had paid and she had received the full £300 a year from her husband's estates in bona fide ignorance of any doubt as to her right to do so.

Held (1) that from the time the widow became entitled to the additional annuity of £60 she was only entitled to receive an annuity of £240 from her husband's estate, but (2) that she was not bound to repay the over-payments.

MR JAMES HUNTER, of the Indian Civil Service, was married to Miss 2ND DIVISION.
Katharine Christina Meiklejohn in 1864. By antenuptial contract of marriage, dated 3d March 1864, between him and his intended wife, Mr Hunter, inter alia, bound himself "to pay or allow to be retained from his civil service salary such annual or other contributions to the Bombay Civil Fund as will secure to his widow the usual annuity or other benefits of said Bombay Civil Fund after his death : And in the event of the said Katharine Christina Meiklejohn surviving her said husband, and not being on his death entitled to the annuity or other benefits of the said Bombay Civil Fund by reason of the retirement from the service of the said James Hunter, non-payment of the annual or other contributions to said fund during his life, or from any other cause, then and in that event the said James Hunter, in lieu of such annuity or other benefits of Bombay Civil Fund so lost to his widow by reason of his failure to secure the same, binds and obliges himself and his heirs and representatives whomsoever to pay to the said Katharine Christina Meiklejohn, in the event of her surviving him, a free yearly annuity of £300 sterling during all the days of her lifetime." Then followed certain minor provisions in favour of Mrs Hunter; and the contract bore that she accepted the provisions in her favour as in full satisfaction of her legal rights.

Mr Hunter, who had retired from the Indian Civil Service shortly after his marriage, on his succession to the estate of Hafton in Argyllshire, died without issue on 20th April 1876 survived by his widow and leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 27th July 1865. He had during his life made the contributions necessary to secure the usual annuity to his widow from the Bombay Civil Fund.

By his settlement Mr Hunter conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to trustees for, inter alia, the following purposes:— "That my trustees shall implement the obligations undertaken by me in regard to the annuity and other provisions settled upon my wife, the said Mrs Katharine Christina Meiklejohn or Hunter, by the contract of marriage entered into between me and her, . . . and I direct my trustees to make payment to the said Mrs Katharine Christina Meiklejohn or Hunter, in the event of her surviving me, of a free yearly annuity of £300 sterling during all the days of her life, in addition to what she is entitled to under said contract of marriage . . . my intention being that the said Mrs Katharine Christina Meiklejohn or Hunter, should she survive me, shall have a free annuity of £600 under said marriage-contract and these presents, any annuity she may receive from the Bombay Civil Fund being imputed to account thereof: But declaring that in the event of the said Mrs Katharine Christina Meiklejohn or Hunter from any cause losing or not receiving from said Bombay Civil Fund the usual annuity of widows of Indian civil servants, she shall only be entitled to a free annuity of £500 from my own proper funds, to which sum her annuity under said marriage-contract and these presents shall in that event be restricted."

The trustees were further directed, in the events which had happened, to convey the residue of the testator's means and estates to his brother, Mr William Frederick Hunter.

Mr W. F. Hunter having made up his title to the estate of Hafton, on 15th May 1878, executed a bond of annuity in favour of his brother's widow, by which he bound himself to pay to her furth of the estate of Hafton a free annuity of £600, under similar conditions to those in the settlement as to imputing to account of payment of the annuity whatever sums she might receive from the Bombay Civil Fund, and also as to the restriction of the annuity to £500 in the event of the failure of that fund. Mr W. F. Hunter further undertook to fulfil all the purposes of his brother's settlement, and executed a discharge and bond of indemnification in favour of his brother's trustees.

The amount of the provision payable to Mrs Hunter at her husband's death from the Bombay Civil Fund was £300 a-year, and in implement of the arrangement just narrated, Mr W. F. Hunter, and after his death in 1880 his trustees, paid an additional sum of £300 a-year to Mrs Hunter. This payment continued until 1894, when a special case was presented for determination of the question whether Mr W. F. Hunter's estates were burdened with an additional payment to Mrs Hunter at the rate of £300 a-year, or whether the additional payment should be reduced to £240. The parties to the special case were (1) Mr W. F. Hunter's trustees and (2) Mrs Hunter.

Hunter's
Trustees v.
Hunter.

The case set forth the facts already narrated, and stated further that in 1882 by Act of Parliament (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 45) the assets and liabilities of the Bombay Civil Fund were transferred to the Government of India, it being by sec. 2 of the Act, inter alia, enacted that the widows of civil servants being incumbents of an annuity from the fund should receive the amount of such an annuity from the revenues of India with the additional benefits of a "pension of £60 per annum, such additional benefit to take effect as from the 1st of April 1882." The case then stated;—"Under the provisions of this Act the second party has, since 1st April 1882, been in receipt of the pension of £60 thereby granted, in addition to the annuity of £300 formerly received by her from the said fund, and to the annuity of £300 paid her by the first parties as above mentioned. The first parties were not in point of fact aware, until recently, of the passing of the said Act, or of the additional pension received under it by the second party; who, on the other hand, has all along received and expended the whole of the said annuities and pension in bona fide, and without knowing that there was, or could be, any doubt of her right to receive the whole, although amounting together to more than £600."

In these circumstances the first parties maintained that they were bound for the future to make an additional payment of £240 a-year only to the second party on the ground that the testator intended that the total provision to his widow should in no event exceed £600 a-year, and consequently that the pension of £60 a-year, as well as the original £300 a-year from the Bombay Fund, should be imputed to account of that provision; and, on the assumption that this contention was well founded, the first parties further maintained that they were entitled to repayment with interest of the sums received by the second party since 1st April 1882 in excess of £600 a-year.

The second party maintained that the pension of £60 a-year ought not to be imputed to account of her provision, and that even if it ought to be so imputed for the future, she was not bound to repay sums received by her in excess, such sums having been received and consumed by her in bona fide ignorance of her legal rights.

The questions in law were:—" (1) Is the second party entitled to receive from the first parties an annuity of £300 per annum in addition to her annuity and pension of £360 from the Indian Government as in place of the Bombay Civil Fund? or (2) Is the second party entitled to receive in each year from the first parties only such a sum as will, together with the said annuity and pension of £360, give her a total annuity of not more than £600? (3) In the event of the second question being answered in the affirmative, is the second party bound to repay to the first parties the sums received by her in excess of £600 per annum; and if so, is she liable for interest on such over-payments, and at what rate?"

nuptial contract of marriage to pay or allow to be retained from his salary as an Indian civil servant the contribution necessary to secure the usual annuity to his widow from the Bombay Civil Fund, and he undertook, if his widow should not get the benefit of the fund through his failure, that she should receive an annuity of £300 after his death. He did secure the Bombay Civil Service Fund annuity to her by contribution, and on his death she became entitled to it. He succeeded to the estate of Hafton shortly after his marriage, and executed a settlement by which he provided to his widow an annuity of £300 a-year over and above what she was entitled to under the marriage-contract, expressing it to be his intention that she should have a free income of £600 under the contract and the settlement, any annuity coming from the Bombay Fund to be imputed to account of it. There was a subsequent declaration that if the Bombay Fund annuity should fail, then £500 a-year only was to be paid out of his estate.

On James' death without issue he was succeeded in the estate by his brother William, to whom he directed his trustees to convey the residue of his means and estate. William having made up his title to the estate executed a bond of annuity, by which he bound himself to pay to his brother's widow the annuity of £600 a-year, under the same conditions as to the imputing to the annuity what she might receive from the Bombay Fund, and the restriction to £500 in the event of failure of that fund.

Accordingly from that time forward the widow received £300 a-year under the bond of annuity. At first the Bombay Fund yielded only £300 a-year, but the fund having been taken over by the Government of India, widows' annuities were from April 1882 increased by £60. Of this fact William's trustees were ignorant, and accordingly the widow has been receiving £660 annually since that date.

In these circumstances the first question is whether the widow is entitled still to receive £300 under William's obligation? I am of opinion that she is not. The intention of her husband in his settlement is, I think, clearly expressed to be that she shall have a free annuity of £600, and that any annuity she might receive from the Bombay Fund was to be imputed to account of the £600. The Bombay Fund annuity took full effect from his having fulfilled his obligation to pay the contributions necessary, the annuity at that time was £300 a-year, and therefore to make up £600 an additional £300 was necessary, but the intention being definitely and in terms expressed that he desires her to receive £600, and that what comes from the Bombay Fund is to be imputed to that sum, she cannot in my opinion have right to more than £600, and is not in a position to decline to have any part of what comes from the fund imputed towards the £600. I therefore propose that the first question should be answered in the negative, and as following upon that to answer the second question in the affirmative.

The third question is, whether the widow is bound to refund to the trustees the sum of £60 for each year during which she has received the additional £60 from the Bombay Fund, it being held that only the difference between £360 and £600 should have been paid to her. According to the special case the sum was paid to her in good faith, and received by her in good faith, and we must deal with the matter upon that footing. I have felt that there is much difficulty as to how this question should be answered, but have ultimately come to be of opinion that in the circumstances it may be answered in the negative. The trustees were in error in making the payment, but it must be held to have been an error of view as to the widow's legal right, on a question of construction of documents, the view they took being one for which much may be forcibly urged. And the widow was entitled to assume that she was paid only what she was entitled to. It is equitable therefore that she should not be called upon to repay the amount.

Hunter's
Trustees v.
Hunter.

LORD YOUNG.—I think that there is a great deal to be said for the plea of the widow that she is entitled under her husband's settlement to £300 a-year without reference to the pension of £60 given by statute in addition to the annuity previously given to her from the Bombay Civil Fund of £300. Two views have been put before us on this question, the one view being that if from the Bombay Fund annuity and the Government pension together she receives a sum of £360 per annum, then that whole sum is to be imputed to the annuity of £600 to which she is entitled under the settlement. The other view is that the pension of £60 is to be altogether disregarded, and only the original annuity of £300 is to be taken as part of the clear annuity of £600. There is, as I have said, a good deal to be said for that latter view, which is that of the widow, but upon the whole I have come to the conclusion that the other view is the sound one, and that the obligation upon the estate is simply to make up her annual income to £600, so that if she receives £60 more from the Bombay Civil Fund, the contribution from her husband's estate will be so much less. But I do not think that it is at all a clear case, although I am of opinion with your Lordship that the widow is entitled to receive £240 only from the estate as matters stand at present. If anything should happen which would diminish the amount paid from the Bombay Civil Fund then her claim against the estate would revive.

Then there is this other question, whether it is the duty of the trustees to recover, and of the widow to repay, this £60 per annum which she has received and spent for so many years. I am of opinion that there is no such duty. It is said—and I see no reason to doubt it—that both the trustees and the widow acted in ignorance of their true position, and without making any inquiry. I think that all concerned acted in good faith, and I have come to the conclusion that the reasonable view is that the widow is entitled to receive £240 from the estate for the future, without making any deduction in respect of overpayments in the past. I think that the case falls within the equitable rule or principle of property received and consumed in good faith. Any other rule might lead to great hardship, even absolute ruin. I do not say that it would do so here. But the hardship and the possible ruin which might result from requiring repayment from one who has received property to which he was not entitled, and which he has consumed in good faith, is the foundation of the equitable rule or doctrine.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—The leading question to be here decided is, what is the amount which Mrs James Hunter is entitled to claim annually under the provisions in her favour contained in her marriage-contract and in her deceased husband's deed of settlement. There is no doubt as to the nature of her right under the marriage-contract. Under it she is entitled to the annuity or other benefits payable to her as her husband's widow out of the Bombay Civil Fund, or in the event of such annuity or benefits being lost to her from whatever cause, then, in lieu thereof, to a sum of £300 a-year out of her husband's estate. By his deed of settlement Mr Hunter directed his trustees to make payment to his widow of an annuity of £300 per annum, in addition to what she was entitled to under her contract of marriage, but adding these words—"My intention being that the said Mrs Katharine Christina Meiklejohn or Hunter should she survive me, shall have a free annuity of £600 under said marriage-contract and these presents, any annuity she may receive from the Bombay Civil Fund being imputed to account thereof." It is contended for Mrs Hunter that under this provision in her husband's settlement she is entitled to an annual payment of £300 in addition to the sum received by her from the Bombay Civil Fund, whatever that sum may be. This contention appears to me to be distinctly at variance with the expressed will of the trustor. It is clearly stated to be his desire and intention that his widow should have an annual income of £600 under the combined provisions of the marriage-contract and the trust-settlement, and it is just as clearly stated that whatever benefit Mrs Hunter may receive from the Bombay Civil Fund is to be imputed as part of that annual income. The amount payable to Mrs Hunter by her husband's trustees out of Mr Hunter's estate is just so much as, and no more than, in addition to the sum received by her from the fund, will make up a sum of £600 per annum. I think this result is necessarily reached from a consideration of the provisions of the settlement to which I have referred.

Had this result been in any degree doubtful, I think the doubt would have been removed by a consideration of what Mr Hunter has done by way of provision for his wife in the event (which has not happened) of her losing the benefit of the fund. In that event he has provided that she shall receive out of his estate an annuity of £500 "to which sum her annuity under said marriage-contract and these presents, shall in that event be restricted." This is inconsistent with the idea that under the settlement Mrs Hunter was provided with an annuity of £300 absolutely, that is irrespective of any benefit received by her from the fund, for if so, then the husband's restriction of her right would have been unavailing. If Mr Hunter under his settlement gave his widow absolutely an annuity of £300, then she is entitled to that in any case. But if the benefit of the fund ceased from any cause, then by the marriage-contract, in lieu of such benefit, Mr Hunter bound himself to make payment to his widow of £300 a-year. Accordingly, on the cessation of the benefit from the fund there would be due to Mrs Hunter in respect of her husband's marriage-contract obligation £300 per annum, which, with the £300 absolutely hers under the settlement would give her an annuity of £600; although Mr Hunter expressly provides that on the cessation of the benefit from the fund his estate is only to be burdened in favour of his widow to the extent of £500. As he could not restrict his obligation under the marriage-contract, it is plain that he intended the burden on his estate to depend on whether his widow received any benefit from the fund, and the amount, if any, which she so received. In short, as I have already said, Mr Hunter desired that his widow should have an income of £600 a-year, to consist (1) of whatever annuity or benefit she might receive from the fund, and (2) so much but no more from his estate as added to the amount received from the fund would make up the £600. I am therefore of opinion that the first question should be answered in the negative, and the second question in the affirmative.

The third question presents more difficulty. In regard to it I assume that the trustees paid Mrs Hunter £300 a-year irrespective of what she was receiving from the fund, in the view that this was her right under the deed of settlement. Although I think that view erroneous, I cannot say that the trustees were in any way to blame for so construing that deed. It was a view that might very reasonably be entertained. In these circumstances, as both the trustees and Mrs Hunter were in error as to the legal effect of the settlement, I think there is no claim for repetition of what has been already paid to Mrs Hunter. I would therefore answer the third question in the negative.

Husband and Wife—Marriage-contract—Trust—Provision for wife or wife trustee for husband.—By antenuptial bond of annuity A provided to his wife an annuity of £1000 per annum, "to be applied by her towards the expenses of my household and establishment, and that during all the days of my life, . . . moreover, I do hereby renounce and discharge my jus mariti and right of administration of and in relation to" his wife's estate, "including the fore-said annuity payable to her during my lifetime, declaring that the same shall be and remain a separate estate in her person, free of any right or claim on my part whatsoever." Some years after the marriage A executed a trust-disposition of his whole estate for behoof of creditors. Held that the annuity fell to be applied by the wife for her husband's behoof, and that therefore the bond was ineffectual in a question with his creditors.

SIR WILLIAM FRANCIS AUGUSTUS ELIOTT of Stobs, Baronet, was married 1st DIVISION. to Mrs Kelsall on 22d April 1879. By bond of annuity, dated 24th March 1879, which proceeded on the narrative that the marriage had been arranged, Sir William bound and obliged himself and his heirs, "executors, and representatives whomsoever, . . . to pay to the said Mrs Hannah Grissell Birkett or Kelsall, to be applied by her towards the expenses of my household and establishment, and that during all the days of my life, an annuity or yearly sum of £1000 sterling, . . . and in security of the personal obligation before written, I dispoise to and in favour of the said Mrs Hannah Grissell Birkett or Kelsall heritably All and Whole the lands and barony of Stobs and others, . . . And further I . . . bind and oblige myself immediately after the celebration of our marriage, to grant and deliver to the said Mrs Hannah Grissell Birkett or Kelsall a bond and disposition, or other legal obligation, providing and securing to her, in case she shall survive me, out of the said entailed lands and barony of Stobs and others, during all the days of her life after my decease, a yearly annuity of £2000 sterling: . . . of £1000 sterling to be secured to me as aforesaid as in full satisfaction to me of all terce of lands, legal share of moveables, and every other thing that I, jure relicte or otherwise, could ask, claim, or demand from the said Sir William . . . in case I should survive him . . .”

In May 1886 Sir William executed a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors. Down to Martinmas 1887 the trustees thereunder made payment to Lady Elliott of the annuity of £1000. Thereafter they paid her each year only a portion until 1889, when they stopped payment altogether, on the ground that the income of Sir William's whole means and estate was insufficient to pay his creditors.

In June 1893 Lady Elliott, with the consent of her husband, raised an action against Robert Purdom, solicitor, Hawick, the then sole trustee acting under the trust-deed, for payment of the arrears of the annuity and interest thereon.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The said bond of annuity being ineffectual to give the pursuer a preference in a question with her husband's creditors, the defender should be assoilzied.

On 14th March 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) assoilzied the defender.*

* “OPINION.—The question in this case is whether Lady Elliott is a creditor under the antenuptial contract between her and Sir William for an annuity of £1000 per annum, which is provided to her during Sir William's life. There is no dispute as to the annuity provided to her in the event of her widowhood. The question is whether she can rank as a creditor for £1000 per annum, which Sir William undertook to pay to her, ‘to be applied by her towards the expenses of my household and establishment, and that during all the days of my life.’

“The defender, who is trustee for Sir William's creditors, contends that this is not a proper marriage-contract provision conferring upon Lady Elliott an individual and independent right, but is on the contrary truly a trust for Sir William's own behoof. The express purpose of the provision, he says, makes that clear. The pursuer, on the other hand, contends that the purpose expressed does not qualify her (Lady Elliott's) right, but merely expresses the motive of the trust, Lady Elliott being no doubt expected to apply the money in the way mentioned, but not being bound to do so, and this being, it is said, made clear by the subsequent clause in the contract by which Sir William renounces his jus mariti and right of administration, inter alia, over the fore-said annuity, ‘declaring that the same shall be and remain a separate estate in her (Lady Elliott's) person, free of any right or claim on my part whatsoever.’

“Now, I do not doubt that if this annuity had been granted to Lady Elliott simply for her separate use, she would have been a creditor for its amount. That, I understood, was conceded. Neither am I prepared to say that the result would have been different if the annuity had been granted for her separate use to be applied by her for the upkeep of the joint establishment of the spouses, while they both survived and lived together. It may be (I have not considered the question) that there would thereby have been constituted an independent interest in the pursuer's person which, as one of the conditions of the marriage, she might have been entitled to vindicate. But the difficulty is that the application in fact prescribed is not even in terms an application for the lady's benefit. She might come to live apart from her husband, and yet the annuity would, I suppose, still be applicable to the upkeep of the husband's establishment. Moreover, the upkeep of the husband's establishment is after all simply payment of the husband's debts, and therefore if the application expressed is obligatory, I do not, I confess, understand how the pursuer's position is to be maintained. Accordingly the pursuer's proposition really comes to be as I have said, that the purpose or application of the annuity is not expressed as part of the contract, but only mentioned by way

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—The contract secured Lady Elliott No. 186. in a right to the annuity as her separate estate. The purpose expressed in the deed was not a condition of the gift, but only an expression of motive or of desire as to its application. That was made clear by the subsequent clause, which excluded all participation by the husband in the money, and left the spending of it absolutely under the control of the wife. July 7, 1894.
Elliott v. Elliott's Trustees.

Argued for the defender ;—The contract really constituted a trust for Sir William's own benefit by locking up a part of his estate so as to defeat, if possible, the diligence of creditors. The annuity was to be devoted entirely to the payment of the husband's own expenses, the purpose expressed in the deed being an imperative condition of the gift. The wife here was in no more favourable position than any other trustee for the husband.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right, and ought to be sustained. We have to consider what is the substance and effect of the provision to Lady Elliott in the bond of annuity. Now, I take it that the purpose to which this annuity of £1000 was to be appropriated being set out on the face of the engagement to pay, that is the only purpose to which it can lawfully be applied. That being so, the purpose is clearly said to be that it shall be applied towards the expenses of the husband's household and establishment. If that be the condition on which alone the pursuer is entitled to receive this £1000 a-year, does the fact that she makes herself the distributor and apportioner of the money make the case different? Would the position have been different had the arrangement been for payment to any other person, —a steward or housekeeper,—to defray the household expenses? I think not. The counsel for the reclamer referred to the passage at the end of the deed, where it is declared that the annuity shall be and remain a separate estate in the wife's person, free of any right or claim whatsoever on the part of the husband. But as Mr Rankine justly answered, this declaration must be read along with the description of the annuity to which this clause is relative. So read, the deed only constitutes a trust for a particular purpose, the purpose, that is, which is specified in the opening part of the deed, and gives to the wife no right or claim to have anything done with the sum other than what is set out at the beginning. Though she may have a discretion as to the mode in which she appropriates the sum, the purpose for which it is granted remains the same. The plain sense of the matter is this—a lady marries, and in order to ensure that her husband shall keep up what she deems a proper establishment, she binds him to set aside a certain annual sum for household expenses, and she of expressing the grantor's motive and expectation. Now, I am not able to so read the contract. I think the words used must, if possible, be read as operative, and as expressing part of the contract. And that being so, I think the result is that the pursuer has no independent right which can compete with that of her husband's creditors. I think the arrangement in question comes in fact merely to this,—that Lady Elliott should receive during the marriage a fixed allowance for housekeeping, and should also be free from her husband's control in its disposal. Now, that may have been a quite good agreement between husband and wife, but it is not an agreement which, in my opinion, is good against the husband's creditors. I must, therefore, assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the summons, with expenses."

No. 186. makes herself the apportioner and disbursing officer of this allowance. It is impossible to say that she can insist that her husband's household shall be kept up in this style while the creditors remain unpaid.

July 7, 1894. Elliott v. Elliott's Trustees.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur, and I do so on the grounds stated by your Lordship and by the Lord Ordinary. Under this bond of annuity Lady Elliott virtually became the trustee of her husband for the sum agreed to be paid. Such a deed, though obligatory between husband and wife, can have no other force whatever. The reason for this is, that no one is entitled to put his funds into a position in which they are not available for his ordinary debts, or to set aside a part of his income from his creditors. Under this bond of annuity Sir William Elliott gave no separate interest to his wife,—separate and distinct, that is, from the interest he himself had in the object proposed.

Hogg v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

Burgh—Height of houses—Dean of Guild—Edinburgh Municipal and Police (Amendment) Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. cxxxvi.), sec. 44.—The Edinburgh Municipal and Police (Amendment) Act, 1891, sec. 44, enacts that "houses or buildings in any existing street or court shall not, without the sanction of the magistrates and council, be increased in height above" a certain height.

Held that this enactment applied to houses which it was proposed to erect on ground hitherto unbuilt on fronting an existing street.

 Dean of Guild Court, Edinburgh.

ON 6th April 1894 John Hogg, builder, Leith, presented a petition in the Dean of Guild Court, Edinburgh, for warrant to erect two tenements of dwelling-houses upon a vacant piece of ground, hitherto unbuilt upon, fronting Maryfield Place, Edinburgh.

On 14th June the Dean of Guild pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect that the height of the petitioner's proposed tenements exceeds the height prescribed by section 44 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891, as amended by section 34, subsection 5, of the Edinburgh Improvement and Municipal and Police (Amendment) Act, 1893,* and that the petitioner has not obtained the consent of the Town-council to such increased height, refuses the prayer of the petition in hoc statu, and decerns."

* The Edinburgh Municipal and Police (Amendment) Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. cxxxvi.), sec. 44, enacts,—“Houses or buildings in any existing street or court shall not, without the sanction of the magistrates and council, be increased in height above the height of one and a quarter times the width of the street or court in which such houses or buildings are situate, measuring from the level of the pavement to the ceiling of the highest habitable room. Provided always that any existing house or building in any existing street if taken down may be rebuilt to its existing height.”

The Edinburgh Improvement and Municipal Police (Amendment) Act, 1893, (56 and 57 Vict. cap. cliv.), sec. 34, enacts,—“Sections 42 and 44 (i.e., of the 1891 Act) shall be read as if the word ‘habitable’ occurring therein respectively were omitted therefrom.”

The petitioner appealed on the ground that the provisions of the Edinburgh Police Act founded on by the Dean of Guild did not apply to houses which it was proposed to build on ground hitherto unbuilt upon. No. 187.
July 7, 1894.
Hogg v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

The Lord Provost and Magistrates of Edinburgh appeared as respondents in support of the Dean of Guild's judgment.

The parties lodged a joint minute from which the following facts appeared:—

The average height of the petitioner's proposed tenements was 42 feet from the level of the pavement to the ceiling of the highest room. Maryfield Place, by which access would be obtained to the tenements, was an existing public paved street, 24 feet in width. Consequently one and a quarter times the width of the street was 30 feet, which, if the statutory provisions founded on by the Dean of Guild applied, was the maximum height allowed for the tenements without the sanction of the Magistrates and Council, and was exceeded by the height of the petitioner's proposed tenements to the extent of 12 feet.

Argued for the petitioner;—The 44th section of the Act of 1891 did not apply to houses proposed to be erected on ground previously unbuilt upon. The language of the section shewed that. A non-existent house could not be "increased" in height. An analogous section in the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act of 1879 had received this construction.¹ If section 44 was intended to apply to non-existent houses the word "exceed" in height would have been used, as in section 42 of the Act. The judgment of the Dean of Guild ought therefore to be reversed.

Argued for the respondents;—If the construction for which the petitioner contended was sound, it would in part defeat the policy of the section, which was to enable the Magistrates and Council to regulate the height of houses in the city. There was no reason why the height of houses to be erected on ground hitherto unbuilt upon should not be so regulated. "Increased in height" meant "exceed in height." The language of the section might not be very happy, but even on a strict construction "increased" was not wrong. For the section applied not only to "houses" but also to "buildings," and if an unfinished building could not be accurately called a "house" it certainly was a "building," and what the section provided was that after a building had reached a certain height it should not be raised higher unless the sanction of the Magistrates and Council had been obtained. Further, the proviso at the end of the section shewed that houses to be erected in place of houses which had been taken down would, but for the proviso, have been within the general rule, but if it was incorrect to speak of "increasing" the height of a non-existent house to be built on ground hitherto unbuilt on, it was equally incorrect so to speak of a non-existent house to be built in place of one that had been taken down.

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The question is whether the 44th section of the Edinburgh Police Act of 1891 applies to a house built on a site on which a house had never been erected. It provides that houses in an existing street shall not be "increased in height" beyond a limit therein specified. The appellant contends that these words are applicable to existing houses only, because it is a solecism in language to speak of a non-existent house being increased in height.

The respondents admit the inaccuracy of the expression, but they maintain

No. 187. that it means "shall not be raised higher," or "shall not exceed in height." If so, it is unfortunate that neither phrase is used, and that the appropriate correction was not made when the section was amended in 1893.

July 7, 1894. Hogg v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

It seems to be certain that the section applies to houses which are taken down and rebuilt. A similar section in a previous Act was so construed by the Lord President in the case of Pitman, 9 R. 444. The proviso, however, removes all doubt. It declares that any existing house in any existing street, if taken down, may be rebuilt to its existing height. Perhaps there may be difficulty in finding the existing height of a house that has ceased to exist. I daresay that it may be overcome by legitimate construction. But in declaring that a house which is rebuilt may be exceptionally dealt with, the proviso shews that if the benefit of the exception cannot be claimed, the house must be within the rule. In that case the house cannot be raised higher than the height specified in the statute. It follows that in regard to a new house of this kind the words which we are considering must have the meaning which is attributed to them by the respondents.

When this result is reached all difficulty ceases. The same construction which is necessary in one class of new houses must be adopted for all. The words of the section are very general. They comprehend all the houses and buildings in any existing street, and, subject to the proviso, put all under the same limitations as to height. There is no reason why all should not be under the same regulations, or why any should be under none. We must, if it is possible, construe the statute so as not to limit its generality, and in holding that the words "shall not be increased in height" are to be read as equivalent to "shall not exceed in height," I do not offend against the ordinary rules of construction. I am giving them a meaning that they are capable of bearing, and which is in consonance with the purpose of the Act. I have shewn that in one case they are used in that sense. I think that they are used in the same sense in all cases.

LORD TRAYNER.—The decision of this case depends upon the construction which is put upon the 44th section of the Edinburgh Police Act of 1891. That section is certainly not happily expressed, but the construction put upon it by the appellant, and which he asks us to adopt, is a construction which is practically destructive of the section. This, in my view, is not an admissible construction, if any other can be reasonably given to the section which will preserve it and make it of avail, and this, in my opinion, can be done. The word "increased," on which the question turns, may be read, no doubt, as having reference to existing houses; and the observation made by the appellant was quite a fair one, that you cannot "increase" what does not already exist. But "increase" may also be read as equivalent to "made greater." And so read, it will apply to houses already built or to be built. That is the construction I adopt, and I therefore agree with the decision of the Dean of Guild appealed against.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

Succession—Vesting—No gift except in direction to convey.—A testator by trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees to give to his wife the life-rent of his whole estates, and then directed them, as soon as convenient after her death, to convey a specific heritable property to his daughter M, "but in the event of her marrying and having no issue alive at the time of her death, the same shall revert to and belong to my surviving children, share and share alike."

The truster was survived by his wife, by his daughter M, and by other children.

Held that no fee vested in M at the testator's death.

JOHN STEWART, farmer, Westend, Dingwall, died in 1893, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 11th September 1889, by which he conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to his son, Kenneth Stewart, his wife, Mrs Grace Macdonald or Stewart, and his daughter Margaret Stewart, as trustees, directing them, inter alia, in the second place, to give his wife the life-rent of his whole estates, heritable and moveable, and "(Third) that, as soon as convenient after the death of my wife, my trustees shall dispoise and convey to my said daughter Margaret my heritable property in Mill Street, Dingwall, with the pertinents thereto belonging, but, in the event of her marrying and having no issue alive at the time of her death, the same shall revert and belong to my surviving children, share and share alike. . . ."

2^d DIVISION.
Sheriff of Ross,
Cromarty, and Sutherland.

The truster was survived by his wife, by his daughter Margaret, and by other children.

On 28th February 1893 the trustees sold the property in Dingwall which was the subject of the third purpose of the trust to Donald Groat, grocer, Huntly Street, Inverness, at the price of £336, and Groat, who was anxious to execute certain alterations on the property, but was not satisfied with the title offered, consigned the price in bank upon a deposit-receipt in name of the trustees. Subsequently, in November 1893, Groat, who had intimated that he resiled from the contract, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Dingwall, against the trustees as trustees and also as individuals, the leading conclusion being that the defenders should be ordained to indorse and deliver to him the deposit-receipt for the price.

A variety of questions were raised upon record, but the case ultimately came to turn upon the question whether the trustees, with consent of the truster's widow and daughter, could give a good title to a purchaser of the property, the ground of objection being that the property had not vested in the daughter as fiar.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders having no power to sell the said subjects, the pursuer is entitled to resile from the purchase thereof. (2) The defenders having unreasonably delayed, and being now unable to deliver a valid disposition of the said subjects, the pursuer is entitled to resile from the purchase thereof.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders being able and willing to deliver to the pursuer a valid and sufficient disposition of the subjects purchased by him, he is not entitled to resile from the purchase.

On 29th January 1894 the Sheriff-substitute (Hill), holding that the case fell within the rule of Bryson's Trustees v. Clark,¹ pronounced this

No. 188. interlocutor (after findings in fact in conformity with the foregoing narrative):—"Finds in point of law that the trustees had no right to sell, and that they are not in a position to give a good and valid title, Therefore decerns in terms of the conclusions of the petition. . . ."

July 7, 1894.
Groat v.
Stewart's
Trustees.

On appeal the Sheriff (Johnston) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, by virtue of the trust-disposition and settlement of the late John Stewart, dated 11th September 1889, the fee of the subjects in question in this action, described as 'my heritable property in Mill Street, Dingwall,' vested a morte testatoris in his daughter Margaret Stewart, one of the defenders, as an individual, subject to her mother's liferent, and with a substitution in a certain event only: Finds therefore that the defenders, as trustees of the said John Stewart, in conjunction with his widow and daughter Margaret, had title and right to dispose of said subjects, notwithstanding that there was no power of sale in the settlement; therefore recalls the interlocutor appealed against; sustains the first plea in law for the defenders, and assoilzies them from the conclusions of the action. . . ."

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The fee of the property in Dingwall did not vest in anyone until the death of the liferentrix; consequently the trustees, even with the consent of the liferentrix and of Margaret Stewart, could not give a valid title to the defender. The case was indistinguishable from Bryson's Trustees,¹ since the only gift of the fee was contained in the direction to convey at the death of the liferentrix, and until the death of the liferentrix it was impossible to say in whose favour the conveyance was to be made. In any case there was only vesting subject to defeasance in the daughter before the death of the liferentrix,² but such vesting was of no avail in the present question of title.

The defenders supported the Sheriff's judgment upon the grounds stated by him, and further referred to the use of the word "revert" as shewing that a right of fee vested in the daughter subject to a substitution merely.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The question is, whether Margaret Stewart took a fee in the heritable property mentioned in the third purpose of the trust-deed

* NOTE.— . . . It appears to me that the interpretation of the late John Stewart's will is ruled much more nearly by the case of M'Alpine, 10 R. 837, referred to by the defenders, than by that of Bryson, 8 R. 142, founded on by the pursuer. The terms of Mr Stewart's settlement are peculiar, and effect nothing more, in my opinion, than a postponement of the enjoyment of the fee of the Mill Street property during Mrs Stewart's liferent of the estate, coupled with a substitution to Margaret Stewart, the fiar, in one event only, viz., in the event of her marrying and having no issue alive at her own death. This does not provide for the event of her dying unmarried, or for the event of her marrying and having issue alive at her death. This, then, is plainly a substitution directed to the point of the fiar's death, and not a destination over directed to the point of time of the liferenter's death. This substitution Margaret Stewart could, I think, evacuate by deed executed now, just as well as executed after her mother's death, hence I think that the title which the trustees, with concurrence of her and her mother (whose liferent is not protected), are able to give, is valid and sufficient, and that the pursuer is bound to accept it. . . ."

a morte testatoris, so that the trustees with the concurrence of her and the life-renter can give a good title to the purchaser. No. 188.

The truster gave to his widow a liferent of his whole estate, and on her death he directed his trustees to convey the property in question to his daughter Margaret, "but in the event of her marrying and having no issue alive at the time of her death, the same shall revert and belong to my surviving children, share and share alike." July 7, 1894.
Groat v.
Trustees.

The Sheriff-substitute has held that the case falls under the rule of Bryson's Trustees, and that no right vested until the death of the widow. The Sheriff, on the contrary, thinks that the deed creates a mere substitution to Margaret, but only in the event of her marrying and having no issue, and that there is "not a destination over directed to the point of time of the liferenter's death." On these grounds he has decided that the fee vested a morte testatoris.

I am far from saying that the case is free from difficulty, but I have come to be of opinion that no right of fee is vested in Margaret.

There is to be no conveyance till the death of the widow, and until that event occur the person in whose favour it is to be made cannot be known. If Margaret is then alive, the conveyance will be made to her. If she is dead, it will be made to her children, and if she marries and leaves no children, to the surviving children of the truster. I do not think that any substitution is contemplated. The conveyance is to be made in favour of the person or persons who on the death of the liferenter are ascertained to have right to it.

There is no express institution of Margaret's children. It is, however, impossible to doubt that the truster meant that they should take if their mother predeceased the period when the conveyance was to be made. For nothing is given to the surviving children of the truster except in the case of Margaret dying without issue, and the conditio si sine liberis is clearly applicable. Nor is it stated that in order to succeed the children of Margaret must survive the liferenter. But this is the plain meaning of the trust-deed, inasmuch as there can be no conveyance in their favour unless they survive that event.

According to the words of the trust-deed, there is no institution of the surviving children of the truster, except in the event of Margaret's marrying and leaving no issue alive at the time of her death. It is doubtful whether we should read the words in their literal sense. It is difficult to imagine that the truster could intend that the succession of his own children should depend on the fact of Margaret's marrying or not marrying, and if they might succeed though Margaret never married, they might also succeed if she left issue who, by predeceasing the liferenter, could not be disponees. But it is not necessary to enter into that question. For however strictly we construe the trust-deed, I cannot accept the proposition that there is nothing more than a mere postponement of the enjoyment of the fee. It is at the present time uncertain who is to be the eventual fiar. If it happened that Margaret married and predeceased the liferenter without leaving issue, the conveyance must be made in favour of the truster's surviving children. They would take in their own right, and not as substitutes to Margaret. If Margaret died unmarried there would be intestacy. For nothing could vest in her while it was uncertain whether the disposition was to be in her favour, and nothing could vest in the other children of the truster if their right was conditioned on the marriage of Margaret.

No. 188. The ground of the Sheriff's judgment is that there is nothing more than a postponement of the fee, with a substitution to Margaret in favour of the children of the truster who may survive her, though in one event only. He seems to me to leave out of account that no right is given except through a conveyance to be made on the death of the liferenter, and that until that event shall happen it is uncertain in whose favour it is to be made. So long as the uncertainty exists there cannot be vesting. The conveyance is withheld not merely for the protection of the liferenter, but also in the interest of the contingent disponee.

Groat v.
Trustees.

I have already said that in my opinion there is no substitution. When the liferenter dies the conveyance will be made to the person who on the occurrence of that event is ascertained to be the disponee. If Margaret survives the liferenter there will be a simple conveyance in favour of herself and her heirs. There is no direction that it shall contain a destination in favour of her children, and if they are not to be included as substitutes, there cannot be a substitution of the children of the truster who might survive her, but conditional on her marrying. It is said that the direction that the property "shall revert and belong to my surviving children," indicates that it shall pass from Margaret to them, and therefore that they take as substitutes to her. To my mind there is no force in the argument. The language is inaccurate, but I cannot read a clause, the evident purpose of which is to specify the person in whose favour the conveyance is to be made, as directing a substitution.

Nor do I see any ground for holding that the surviving children of the truster mean the children who survive Margaret. The whole clause is conditioned on the death of the liferenter, and just as the word "surviving" must in the ordinary case be referred to the date of distribution, so in this case it must be referred to the date at which the clause comes into operation. The surviving children of the truster are only possible disponees by reason of surviving the liferenter.

Income-tax—Deductions for wear and tear—Obsolete type of ship—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35), sec. 100, Schedule D, Case I. Rule iii.—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878 (41 Vict. c. 15), sec. 12.—Section 12 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, provided that the Commissioners should in assessing the profits or gains of any trade or adventure chargeable under schedule D of the Income-Tax Acts, or the profits of any concern chargeable by reference to the rules of that schedule, “allow such deduction as they may think just and reasonable, as representing the diminished value by reason of wear and tear during the year of any machinery or plant used for the purposes of the concern.”

Held that the owners of a ship engaged in trade were not entitled under this section to a deduction for depreciation in the value of their ship caused by ships of a better construction being built.

At a meeting of the Commissioners for General Purposes acting under the Property and Income-Tax and Inhabited House Duty Acts for the Lower Ward of the County of Lanark held at Glasgow on 21st March 1894, the Burnley Steamship Company, Limited, owners of the steel steamship “Burnley,” which was employed in the carrying of cargo for hire, appealed against an assessment under schedule D of the Income-Tax Acts for the year ending 5th April 1894, on the sum of £327. The appellants objected that a sufficient sum had not been allowed in respect of diminished value under the provisions of the 12th section of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878.*

The depreciation allowed to the appellants under the assessment had been fixed on the basis of deducting five per cent from the cost of the ship for the first year of her existence, and of deducting five per cent from the written down or reduced value for each subsequent year.

After hearing evidence, the Commissioners found the deduction of depreciation at the rate of five per cent upon the written down value from year to year just and reasonable, in the case of a vessel such as the “Burnley,” if applied as an average rate over a series of years. The Commissioners accordingly confirmed the assessment.

The appellants thereupon asked and obtained a case for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer† under the Taxes Management Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 19), sec. 59.

Argued for the appellants ;—Under the Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35), sec. 100, schedule D, case 1, rule 3, the Commissioners were empowered to make a deduction only for the actual cost of repairs. It being thought inequitable that no allowance should be made for plant

* Quoted in rubric.

† “NOTE.—The Commissioners in this case were asked by the appellants to take into consideration, in deciding what rate was just and reasonable, the facts (1) that ships frequently became obsolete and of less earning power before they were physically worn out ; and (2) that their market or sale value might and frequently did fall below their value as fixed by the depreciation rate allowed in making the assessment or even that proposed by the appellants. Evidence was led on both these points. The Commissioners are of opinion that the words ‘diminished value by reason of wear and tear’ used in section 12 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, do not cover (a) loss of earning power owing to plant being rendered more or less obsolete through the introduction of improved or other plant, or (b) diminution in market value apart from its having been caused by wear and tear.”

No. 189. gradually becoming depreciated, the Customs and Revenue Act, 1878, by section 12, introduced an allowance for diminished value by reason of tear and wear. Now, these latter words were open to construction, and occurring as they did in a remedial statute they must receive a liberal construction.¹ So construed they covered depreciation caused by newer and better ships being built.

July 10, 1894.
Burnley
Steamship
Co., Limited,
v. Surveyor of Taxes.

Argued for the Surveyor of Taxes;—It was a sufficient answer to the appellants' argument to say that the "tear and wear" contemplated by the Act of 1878 was physical deterioration caused by ordinary use of the subject. It could not cover depreciation caused by plant becoming obsolete and out of date.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Mr Dickson very properly admitted that if the question were to be determined upon a consideration of the Act of 1842, he would have no case. The provision of the Act of 1878 referred to was passed because the Act of 1842 did not allow anything to be deducted but the actual amount of repairs. It is, therefore, really upon the Act of 1878 that the question turns.

Now, I can quite follow the argument by which it is maintained for the shipowners that a logical carrying out of the policy of the provision ought to lead to a further extension of the principle of allowing deductions. I do not say that this is a necessary consequence, but the contention is plausible.

The question we have, however, to consider, is whether the relief now claimed is given by the Act of 1878, and I think it quite plain that it is not. What is asked is an allowance for loss of earning power owing to the plant being rendered more or less obsolete through the introduction of improved or other plant.

Now, by the words "the introduction of improved or other plant" is meant improved plant in the ships of other people, and accordingly the state of the argument is this,—Can we say that this company's ship has suffered "wear and tear" because other people have built better ships? The words "wear and tear" clearly point to physical deterioration going on in the subject under consideration, and to bring under those words the fact that the ship is of less value because other and better ships have been built is entirely unwarrantable. I am, therefore, in favour of refusing the appeal.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion, and upon the same grounds. It seems to me that the kind of depreciation referred to under head (a) in the Commissioners' note, if it is such depreciation as will affect the earning capacity of the vessel during the year actually current, has been already allowed for, because on the income side of the account the amount of profit is less, and therefore less duty is paid. But if it is intended to cover the case of a vessel being rendered in competition with others less able to earn freight for the remainder of its existence, then I think that, on the principle of the case of the Coltness Iron Company v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue (Feb. 6, 1879, 6 R. 617, and April 7, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 67), and other cases of that class, no deduction can be allowed on that head, because the assessment is not made on the capital value but on the income, and the principle of the Act is that you must pay the tax even on a diminished income, and when the power of raising income is exhausted the tax of course ceases. There is one, and only one, exception admitted to this somewhat hard principle of taxation, and that is that a deduction is to be allowed for diminished value caused by wear and tear, but on a fair construction these words only mean physical deterioration apart from the subject becoming less useful owing to the invention of better machinery or modes of doing the same thing.

v. Link.

"The company was formed for the purpose of acquiring steamships, and founding a line of steamers, to be known as the 'Columba' Line, to run from the United Kingdom to North American ports. The company acquired four steamers known as the 'Pelican,' 'Kent,' 'Louisiana,' and 'Alabama' for its purposes, and the price was to be paid partly by cash raised on mortgages of the vessels, partly by bills, as well as from other sources. Money was raised on mortgage of certain of the vessels.

"Some time after the formation of the company, the company, without having themselves worked the vessels, arranged for the sale of their property, or a great part thereof, including said four vessels, to a society or company formed and registered in Belgium, and called The Columba Belge Navigation Compagnie, which company was to pay a lump price of £89,000, being £40,000 in cash and £49,000 in its own shares. The 'Kent' and the 'Pelican' have been delivered to the said Belgian Company, and the said Belgian Company have made payment of about £16,000 in cash, and have undertaken to transfer £24,000 of their shares to the Columba Company; but the 'Louisiana' and 'Alabama,' which also form part of the property sold for said lump price, are at present in the possession of a mortgagee, a Mr Stewart, engineer, Glasgow.

"In order to the Columba Company receiving the balance of the said lump price of £89,000 (£40,000 in cash and £49,000 in shares of the Belgian Company), it will be necessary for the Columba Company to transfer the remainder of the property agreed to be transferred, including the 'Louisiana' and the 'Alabama,' to the Belgian Company, and, on making such transference, they will be in a position, as the respondents believe and aver, to make payment of the debts due to all the creditors, and will have a valuable property in said Belgian Company.

"If, however, a winding-up order were pronounced as craved by the petitioners, the said 'Louisiana' and 'Alabama' would not pass into the possession of the liquidator, but would be realised by said mortgagee, and the value would be entirely lost to the Columba Company, and further, there would arise to the said Belgian Company against the Columba Company a large claim of damages for the non-fulfilment of the contract to transfer the property at the said lump price, as well as for repayment of what has been already paid. A liquidator would further be without funds to incur the responsibility of questions arising between the Columba Company and the said Belgian Company relative to the carrying out by that company of its said agreement with the Columba Company.

"If the Columba Company be not forced into liquidation, the mortgagee, who is interested in said firm of Muir, Houston, & Company [one of the respondents], has expressed his intention not to proceed to realise his security.

"The respondents further have ascertained, and aver, that under the memorandum and articles of association the directors of the Columba Company have, in order to secure premiums of insurance, hypothecated to underwriters at Lloyd's the calls which might otherwise have been made by a liquidator upon the shares so far as not fully paid up (or issued as fully paid up), and that, in the event of a liquidation, a liquidator would only have the claim upon the said Belgian Company, which he would not be able to enforce if unable to perform the Columba Company's part of said contract.

"The respondents refer to the sections of the statute quoted in the petition, and also to section 91 thereof, by which it is provided that the ' Court may, as to all matters relating to the winding-up, have regard to the wishes of creditors or contributories as proved to it by sufficient evidence, and may, if it thinks it expedient, direct meetings of the creditors or contributories to be summoned, held, and conducted in such manner as the Court directs, for the purpose of ascertaining their wishes, and may appoint a person to act as chairman of such meeting, and to report the result of such meeting to the Court. In the case of creditors, regard is to be had to the value of the debts due to each creditor. . . . "

v. Link.

A petition for the winding-up of the company had also been presented on 18th January preceding by another creditor, but he had consented to grant delay.

Argued for the petitioners;—The company was unable to pay its debts in the sense of section 80 of the Act of 1862, and the petitioners were entitled, ex debito justitiæ, to a winding-up order.¹ The cases relied on by the respondents as authorities for refusing the prayer of the petition were inapplicable. In them the petitioners were debenture-holders and not outside creditors, and the companies had earned profits, and the prospect of their earning more would have been destroyed if a winding-up order had been pronounced. Here the company had never earned profits, and a liquidator could carry out all that remained to be done as well as the directors. It was impossible to say that there were no assets upon which the order would take effect because there was uncalled capital. Delay was only granted in exceptional circumstances,² and in the present case was unnecessary, and six months had elapsed without anything being done since the first petition for winding up had been presented. If, however, delay was granted, a provisional liquidator must be appointed.³

Argued for the respondents;—The proposition that an unpaid creditor was ex debito justitiæ entitled to a winding-up order only applied where the question was between the petitioning creditor and the company. The matter was one for the creditors of the company to decide, and the Court would not grant the order where (as here) a large majority of them were opposed to it, and the petitioning creditor would not be in a better position by obtaining it.⁴

In any case a petitioning creditor was not entitled to an immediate order, and delay should be granted till a meeting of creditors could be held.⁵

LORD PRESIDENT.—The petitioners, G. P. Gardner & Company, are creditors of the company whose winding-up they seek, and that company is in the position defined by the 80th section of the Companies Act, 1862, because it is a debtor who must be deemed to be unable to pay his debts. The petitioners are therefore, prima facie, entitled to have a winding-up order pronounced.

 v. Link.

But Mr Sym, as representing creditors, who are at the same time, be it observed, in the main shareholders, maintains that the circumstances of the case are such that the ordinary course should not be followed, and in support of his argument he referred particularly to the case of In re Chapel House Colliery Company, 1883 (L. R. 24 Ch. Div. 259).

Now, in that case, the judgment of Lord Justice Bowen states the question raised. His Lordship says (p. 269):—"The case may be decided on the simple principle that no one can be entitled to ask for a winding-up order when it is impossible that he should obtain anything by it. Here, if a winding-up order were made, there are no assets on which it could take effect."

Now, any person objecting to the winding up of a company on this ground is bound to satisfy the Court that the company stands in the predicament he asserts it to occupy. Here, prima facie, there are assets, because there is, among other things, a certain amount of uncalled capital. It is said that this is hypothecated; but that statement is left in such a state of vagueness that we are neither told the amount of the debt for which it is hypothecated nor the amount of stock which is thus hypothecated.

Therefore, it having fallen upon the objectors to make out this point, I think they have completely failed to do so. There is nothing, therefore, against the petitioning creditor being granted a winding-up.

It is true that certain dilatory pleas have been stated to the effect that it is desirable that there should be a meeting of the creditors of the company; but unfortunately, although liquidation was threatened six months ago, apparently no practical step was taken, and no definite practical step has been contemplated. Therefore, unless we are to encourage the idea that every time a company cannot pay an individual creditor it may have the crisis tided over, in order to have time to consider whether it should have the uncalled capital called up, which should in this case have been considered six months ago, I think we cannot give effect to Mr Sym's contention.

LORD M'LAREN concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am also of the same opinion. I take the general rule to be that laid down by Lord Justice Bowen in the case of the Chapel House Colliery Company, where he says that it is not a matter of discretion whether the Court will comply with the application of a creditor whose debt is unpaid for a winding-up, but that it is the duty of the Court to give the creditor that relief which the Legislature intended to give him. His Lordship goes on to say, what is obviously quite consistent with the words I have quoted, that nevertheless the Court will not grant the winding-up order if it is obvious that the machinery of the Act for securing the payment of debts due to company creditors cannot avail for that purpose, and that it would be an abuse of that machinery to put it in motion when it cannot avail for the purpose for which it is intended. But in that case it was clear that the petitioner could take no advantage from the winding-up. It was an application by a debenture-holder for a winding-up order, in respect of interest due on his debentures. All the other debenture-holders opposed the application. It appeared that the company was still carrying on business; its property consisted of a colliery held under a lease which would have been forfeited if the winding-up order had been granted, and all the other assets were so tied up that it would have been impossible for the liquidator or the creditors through him to touch them. The ground, therefore, on which the Court held that no benefit could result to the applicant from a winding-up was simply that there were no assets to be affected by the order, or to come into the hands of the liquidator at all. For the reasons stated by your Lordship, it is impossible to suggest that the company with which we are now concerned is in that position. They obtained £16,000 on a sale of ships, and it is not shewn that the money is beyond the reach of creditors; they have other property subject to a mortgage, the amount of which is not stated, and further, some of the capital is uncalled. It is therefore not made clear that there are no assets existing for payment of the company's debts. That being so, the case of the Chapel House Colliery Company is not an authority for the present case, except in so far as it lays down the general principle that creditors have a legal right which is not subject to the discretion of the Court.

Succession—Conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit.—A mother in her settlement bequeathed one-third of her silver-plate to her daughter M, and small keepsakes to M's daughters, and by a subsequent clause bequeathed to each of her children an equal share of residue. By a codicil the testator, on the narrative of M's death, revoked the bequest of silver-plate, and directed it to be divided among the testator's family. In a question between M's children and the testator's heirs in mobilibus, held that the conditio si sine liberis was to be implied in the settlement with regard to the bequest of residue, and was not displaced by the codicil.

Carter's Trustees v. Carter, Jan. 29, 1892, 19 R. 408, distinguished.

MRS MARGARET MERRY OR FORRESTER, residing in Ayr, died on 23d June 1893, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 23d July 1888, by which she conveyed to her trustees her whole means and estate for the purposes of the trust and codicils of subsequent dates.

The second purpose was " . . . For delivery and payment of the specific bequests and legacy after mentioned, viz.:— . . . (Fifth) To my daughter Mrs Margaret Elizabeth Forrester or Robson, one-third of my silver and plated articles so far as not specially bequeathed, the mourning brooch with my father's hair in it, the half of my napery and wearing apparel, and a knitted bed-cover, one of my bracelets for her daughter Margaret Merry, and another for her daughter Agnes as keepsakes." She further directed,—“(Lastly) I direct and appoint my trustees to divide the residue of my said means and estate into seven equal shares, and to pay over one share to each of my said children, excepting my son Robert Forrester, whose share I direct and appoint my said trustees to hold in trust for behoof of his wife Mrs Margaret Campbell or Forrester, in liferent for her liferent alimentary use alienarily, and for her children in fee, payable the said fee to the said children on their respectively obtaining majority, or to the survivors or survivor of them (their mother's liferent having always first lapsed).”

A codicil dated in May 1890 was in the following terms:—“May 1890.—Now, since poor Maggy [Mrs Robson] is gone, I leave all my

No. 191. silver to William Forrester, with the chest. The tea set to Kate Vaughan. The hot-water jug to Henry Forrester. Other things not named to be divided amongst my family. (Signed) MARGARET FORRESTER."

July 12, 1894.
Forrester's
Trustees v.
Forrester.

The question having been raised whether Mrs Robson's children were entitled to their mother's share of residue, a special case was presented to the Court by (1) Mrs Forrester's trustees; (2) William Forrester and others, the truster's heirs in mobilibus; and (3) the children of Mrs Robson.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were:—" (1) Has the said share of residue in question, destined to the said Mrs Margaret Elizabeth Forrester or Robson, fallen into intestacy, and ought the same to be divided by the first parties as trustees and executors foresaid according to the laws of intestate succession? or (2) Ought the said share of residue to be paid by the first parties as trustees and executors foresaid to the third parties?"

Argued for the second parties;—The question here was whether the conditio si sine liberis applied so as to entitle the third parties to their mother's share of the residue. It was settled that there was no room for the application of the doctrine unless it could be clearly shewn that a testator had overlooked or forgotten the contingency of his child predeceasing him, and leaving issue.¹ That could not be said here. In the will, the testatrix shewed that she was then aware that her daughter Margaret had children; and again in the codicil she expressly shewed that she had in her mind her daughter's death. The just inference was that she had purposely failed to dispose of the share of residue appointed to be paid to Margaret. The result was that Margaret's share of the residue fell into intestacy, and fell to be divided among the surviving children of the testatrix, and the issue of Margaret as representing their mother.

Argued for the third parties;—As regarded the relationship of the parties, this was a typical case for the application of the conditio,² which moreover was not prevented by the terms either of the will or of the codicil. The giving in the will of "keepsakes" to Margaret's children could not be regarded as a gift to them to come in place of what they would take otherwise in succession to their mother.³ The reference in the codicil to Margaret's death was merely to explain the desire of the testatrix to give to other of her descendants that which she had originally intended for Margaret.

LORD M'LAREN.—This special case raises a question of some general importance, but not, as I venture to think, attended with any serious difficulty. It is rather remarkable, considering the number of questions to which the conditio si sine liberis has given rise, that this one should now apparently be raised for the first time. But the case is that the testatrix, while providing in a very usual way for the division of her estate amongst her children, and saying nothing about the contingency of one of these children dying leaving issue, afterwards made a codicil in which she does refer to the death of a daughter who had died between the date of the execution of the will and that of the codicil.

Now, it was argued to us on behalf of the first parties, who are the next of kin, that the foundation of the rule of law, known as the conditio si sine liberis, is the presumption that the testator has overlooked the contingency of a child dying leaving issue, because it is not supposed that any parent making a will, and not leaving his or her money to go as the law directs, would omit all reference to such a case if he or she had contemplated it. That seems to have been the foundation of the rule of Roman law, and has been generally referred to as underlying the form of the conditio which has been received into our law. Then it is argued that if a testator, as in this case, survives a child and makes a codicil, and especially if in that codicil reference is made to the death of the child, the foundation of the rule is taken away, and it must be assumed that there was no intention to give to the issue of the predeceasing child any share of the succession. Reference was also made to the circumstance that some of these children of Mrs Robson, the daughter who died, received some small articles of jewellery as mementoes or keepsakes of the testatrix.

No. 191.
Forrester's
Trustees v.
Forrester.

Now, it is quite true that we have admitted this qualification of the conditio, that it may be excluded by an express clause dealing with the contingency in question. If a testator, contemplating the case of the death of his immediate descendants, makes a special provision for their issue, then that special provision comes in place of the conditio right which would otherwise have come to them. But it appears to me that in order to bring the case within that exception either there must be a substantial provision given to the issue, or if it is unsubstantial, it must be given with such explanations as shew that it was not intended that under any circumstances the individual in question was to take more. A testator may give a nominal sum to a descendant for the very purpose of shewing that no substantial right was intended to be given; but where the bequest to the grandchild takes the form which we have in this will,—“One of my bracelets for her daughter Margaret Merry, and another for her daughter Agnes, as keepsakes”—it is plain that she was not thinking of giving any benefit to the children of her daughter Mrs Robson, but only giving something which they were to retain as a mark of affection. Therefore I cannot admit that the giving of these articles of jewellery as keepsakes can be regarded as a gift or benefit to those children in place of what they might otherwise take in succession to their mother.

Then with reference to the argument founded on the codicil, everything depends in such cases upon the purpose for which reference is made to the death of a legatee. If in the codicil the lady had begun by referring to the death of her daughter, and then had dealt with her share of the succession—dealing with it, it may be, incompletely—probably we should have held that the conditio was displaced, and that the vacant share must be disposed of in the precise manner prescribed by the codicil, even although that might lead to the exclusion intentionally or unintentionally of one of the objects who might be expected to be favoured. But then she only refers to the death of her daughter Maggy—that is Mrs Robson—for the purpose of disposing of three articles of silver-plate which she had left to her in the same deed in which she gives the other articles which she describes as keepsakes. Of course these were articles which could not be divided. If they went to a class they could not be enjoyed specifically by that class, and could only have been enjoyed by being sold, and that would not be consistent with the lady's intention in making the gift. And so she wishes these articles to be retained in her family; she makes them over to other members of the family—two to sons and one to a daughter—and it is significant that these silver things are not given to the children of Mrs Robson. I cannot think, therefore, that when she was disposing of those

No. 191. silver articles she was thinking at all of the contingency of the death of her daughter, and the necessity which would then arise of making a suitable provision for the issue. The argument would not have been very strong even if she had provided that the pieces of plate should go to Mr Robson's children, because she would have been merely continuing what she had given as a keepsake to her daughter's descendants. But when they take no benefit whatever under the codicil, it is difficult to see that the mere reference to her death, for the purpose of conferring a benefit upon other members of the family, can be taken as meaning a displacement of the conditio si sine liberis. The rule has received in some cases liberal extension, and I think while this case is in some respects distinguishable from all previous cases,—I mean it raises a new point,—yet to hold the conditio excluded here would be contrary to the spirit and tendency of all the recent decisions on this subject. It was not disputed at the bar that if the will had directed a division amongst the family without naming them, the application of the conditio would be clear, but in the case of children I can hardly think that the question of succession is to depend on whether they be named or unnamed, because if they are named that is merely for the purpose of distinguishing the different benefits which each is intended to receive. In this case the children are not all left on the same footing. One of the sons gets only a life interest, and therefore it was necessary to name them all, not, as I think, for the purpose of putting them on the footing of the legatees who were only intended to take personal benefit, but simply for the sake of clearness in distinguishing the interests which each was to receive in the division of the residue of the estate. My view, therefore, is that neither on the ground of small bequests being given to Mrs Robson's daughters, nor on the ground that in the codicil reference has been made to Mrs Robson's death, can we find sufficient reasons for excluding the application of the conditio si sine liberis, and that we ought to answer the second question in the affirmative.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think the case when fully considered is really a very strong one for the application of the conditio si sine liberis. The testatrix directs her trustees to divide the residue of her estate into seven equal shares, and to give one share to each of the children whom she has named in a previous part of the will. There is no gift over to the survivors of the children or to anyone else in case any one of those seven children should die before the testatrix. The question then is, whether the share of a predeceasing child is to go to the children of that child by virtue of the conditio, or whether we are to hold that in so far as regards that share of the estate the testatrix has died intestate.

Now, I should be very sorry to say anything inconsistent with the doctrine to which we gave effect in the case of Carter's Trustees v. Carter, which was established by the previous case of Malcolm v. Greig, or at all events which was very clearly expounded by Lord Corehouse in Malcolm v. Greig. There can be no question that the presumption which arises from the failure of the testator to advert to the contingency of one of his legatees dying leaving issue, may be rebutted by evidence, in the will itself, of the contrary, and there can be no stronger evidence to defeat the presumption, as Lord Corehouse says, "than a clause in the settlement by which the testator does make a provision for the issue of predeceasing legatees, because," as his Lordship says, "it incontestibly shews that he had them in view when he made the substitution." But No. 191. then there is no provision in this will from beginning to end for the issue of predeceasing legatees. There are several specific legacies in favour of the grand-children of the testatrix, and there is a provision in favour of the children of one of her sons to take effect during the lifetime of the son himself; but there is no provision for the issue of the predeceasing legatees at all that I can find. That is to say, I find nothing in the will which shews that the testatrix contemplated the contingency of one of her children dying before herself and leaving issue, and that she made some provision in contemplation of that contingency, inconsistent with the presumption we are now asked to apply, and therefore I see nothing in the will itself to tend in any degree to defeat the presumption.

July 12, 1894.
Forrester's
Trustees v.
Forrester.

The question which arises on the application of the codicil is of a somewhat different kind. It is quite clear that the testatrix then had in her mind the fact that her daughter Margaret had died, and she could hardly have been ignorant of the fact that she left children for whom she had made, indeed, specific legacies in her will. I think the sole effect of the codicil is that the testatrix provides for a different destination of certain silver-plate which she had left to her daughter Margaret, leaving the will in so far as regards the general estate of the testatrix exactly where it was before.

I agree with Lord McLaren in his observations as to the effect of the codicil. I think the will stands exactly where it did, and that Margaret Robson's children take the share originally destined to their mother by virtue of the condition.

By antenuptial contract of marriage, dated 23d and 27th April 1886, between George Augustus Cuming Elliott, of 44 Queen Street, Edinburgh, on the one part, and Miss Edith Hamilton, daughter of Richard Fisher Hamilton, of Lisson Hall, in the county of Dublin, with the special advice and consent of her father, and her father for himself, on the other part, Mr Elliott, on his part, conveyed to trustees the whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, then belonging to him or to which he might acquire right during the subsistence of the marriage for the following purposes:—“(Primo) For payment to the said George Augustus Cuming Elliott during his life, and after his death to the said Edith Hamilton, if she shall survive him, of the free annual income or revenue thereof, for the liferent and alimentary use alienary of them and the survivor of them: Declaring that the same shall not be affectable by the debts or deeds of either of them, or the diligence of their creditors. (Secundo) After the death of the survivor of the said spouses, for behoof of the child or children of the present marriage,” subject to certain provisions not necessary to be mentioned here. “(Tertio) In the event of the said George Augustus Cuming Elliott surviving his said intended spouse and there being no children or issue of children of the said intended marriage then alive, the said trustees shall assign, dispose, and reconvey to the said George Augustus Cuming Elliott the whole trust-estate hereinbefore conveyed or agreed to be conveyed by him. (Quarto) In the event of the said Edith Hamilton surviving the said George Augustus Cuming Elliott and of there being no children or issue of children of the said intended marriage then alive, or in the event of such children or issue of children all predeceasing the said Edith Hamilton, the said trustees shall on the death of the said Edith Hamilton pay and convey the said whole trust-estate to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of the said George Augustus Cuming Elliott.” The marriage-contract then contained provisions (not necessary to be explained here) by Miss Hamilton in favour of her intended husband and the children of the marriage. Mr Hamilton, her father, made no provision out of his own funds.

The marriage, which was duly solemnised, was dissolved, without issue, by the death of Mr Elliott on 22d October 1892.

Mr Elliott left a will, in English form, dated 16th January 1888, in the following terms:—“I devise and bequeath all my real and personal estate, including any property over which I have power of appointment whatsoever and wheresoever, unto my dear wife, Edith Maude Elliott, absolutely, and I appoint Henry Bazalgette of Bournemouth, solicitor, sole executor of this my will, and I hereby revoke all former wills and testamentary dispositions by me at any time heretofore made.”

He also left a codicil, in Scots form, dated 30th May 1890, by which he recalled the appointment of the executor in the will and appointed “my wife, Edith Maude Elliott, the sole executor of my said will, and with this alteration I hereby confirm my said will.”

After her husband's death Mrs Elliott called on Mr Thomas White, S.S.C., the sole surviving trustee acting under the antenuptial contract of marriage, to denude of the trust-estate and to pay it over to her absolutely. He intimated that, though willing personally to comply with this request, he was not satisfied that he was entitled to do so, in respect that her liferent under the antenuptial contract was declared to be alimentary. No. 192.

Elliott's Trustees v. Elliott.

A special case was accordingly presented, to which the trustee was the first party and Mrs Elliott the second party, for the determination of the following question of law :—"Is the first party bound to denude himself of the trust-estate, and to convey and pay over the capital thereof to the second party?"

The first party maintained that he was not entitled to denude of the trust-estate, and so terminate the alimentary liferent, in the first place, on the ground that it was not the intention of Mr Elliott, as disclosed in his will and codicil, to discharge his estate of the alimentary liferent in his widow's favour, his intention merely being to give her the fee of his estate subject to that alimentary liferent. The first party contended further, that assuming it to be Mr Elliott's intention to discharge the alimentary liferent, he had not power to do so, even with the consent of the second party.

The second party maintained that, on a sound construction of the will and codicil, it was Mr Elliott's intention to give her his whole estate freed of the alimentary liferent, and further that it was in his power to do so, with her consent, there being no other matrimonial purpose for which it was necessary to retain the trust-estate.¹

After a hearing the Second Division appointed the case to be argued before the Judges of the Division and three consulted Judges.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—By the contract of marriage entered into between the second party to this special case, Mrs Edith Maude Elliott, then Miss Hamilton, and Mr George A. C. Elliott, now deceased, Mr Elliott assigned, disposed, and conveyed to certain trustees, the survivor of whom is the first party to this case, all "means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, wherever situated," then belonging to him, or to which he might acquire right during the subsistence of the marriage. The trust purpose now in question is the fourth :—"In the event of the said Edith Hamilton surviving the said George Augustus Cuming Elliott, and there being no children or issue of children of the said intended marriage then alive, or in the event of such children predeceasing the said Edith Hamilton, the said trustees shall on the decease of the said Edith Hamilton pay and convey the said whole trust-estate to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of the said George Augustus Cuming Elliott." The purpose of the trust thus directed to subsist until the death of Mrs Elliott is, so far as she is concerned, the first purpose, by which the trustees are directed after Mr Elliott's death to pay Mrs Elliott "the free annual income or revenue thereof" for her "liferent and alimentary use allenarly," with a declaration added by which the liferent is declared not to be affectable by her debts or deeds, or the diligence of her creditors.

Mr Elliott died without issue, and his will contains the following clause :—

¹ Authorities cited on the question of the revocability of the marriage-contract.—Martin v. Bannatyne, March 8, 1861, 23 D. 705, per L. J.-C. Inglis at p. 709, 33 Scot. No. 192. "I devise and bequeath all my real and personal estate, including any property over which I have power of appointment whatsoever and wheresoever, unto my dear wife, Edith Maude Elliott, absolutely."

July 13, 1894.
Elliott's Trustee v. Elliott.

Under this clause the second party maintains that she is now entitled to call upon the surviving marriage-contract trustee to denude himself of the trust-estate in her favour, and he feeling uncertain as to his position, declines to do so without judicial authority, and accordingly the question now put to the Court is whether the first party is bound to denude of the trust-estate and to pay over the capital to the second party.

The position of Mr Elliott after entering into the marriage-contract was that he had conveyed his property to trustees by deed, under the terms of which he had retained to himself two powers only, the one a power of apportionment among the children of the marriage, to take effect on the death of the last surviving spouse, the other a power of disposal of the estate on the lapse of the liferent purposes by the death of the last survivor of the two spouses, there being then no issue alive. According to the expression of the contract itself, if he predeceases his wife the direction to the trustees to denude is one to take effect only "on the death" of his widow. He could dispose of the fee, but not so that the fief could call upon the trustees to denude in his favour until the contract restriction, under which the trustees were to hold, realise the annual product, and pay it to his widow as an alimentary provision, came to an end by her death. That is the plain course the trustees had to follow, unless by authority of law they were ordained to depart from it. For it is quite certain that if Mr Elliott had left his estates to a third party, the trustees could not have been called upon to denude in his favour whatever security the fief might have offered to make the widow's interest safe, and whatever consent she might have given to renounce her rights under the contract, and accept the equally good or even it might be the better money terms offered to her for its renunciation; for the trustees' duty to protect her enjoyment of the protected alimentary provision would remain. She could not discharge it, and the trustees could not without breach of duty part with the estate on her discharge. In short, the position is such under the deed that nothing can be done which may lead to the defeat of the intention of the trust in creating the trust. And the security provided by the trust is the only security that can be suffered to be the guard of the interest. For only by the trust can the protection specified by it be effectually maintained. Any new arrangement, however binding in its form of expression, will be only a contract between the new contracting parties. The removal of the estate out of the protection of the trust would cause the alimentary unattachable quality of the benefit to perish. That quality would cease to be a protection given by another to secure the enjoyment of a gift, and become a protection stipulated for in his own transaction by the person benefited, in which case, to use the words of the late Lord President Inglis, such a qualification "would be of no avail whatever." For it is a trust, and a trust only, which can protect an estate, and limit its disposal and its liabilities for the debts and obligations of those who have the beneficial enjoyment of it. If a protective trust be competently created, its terms are the law of the administration of the trust property, and all must submit to their operation. Whereas if, without the protection of a trust, estate be made over to another, conditions forbidding or restraining alienation cannot be effectual to protect it from alienation by direct act, or by legal diligence. An alimentary declaration cannot hedge it from attack by those having claims against its owner, or prevent the owner from doing with it what he pleases. No. 192.

The peculiarity of this case is that Mr Elliott, who retained to himself the power of disposing of the fee of his estates in certain events, has by his will bequeathed his whole estates to his widow. This the widow maintains makes her now entitled to demand from the trustee a conveyance of the estate, notwithstanding the direction of the contract that the trustees are only to convey on the death of the widow. Her case is that being now the fiar the trustee is not entitled to continue to hold the estate, and to pay its produce to her from time to time, and that she can give the trustee a sufficient discharge on its being disposed and conveyed to her absolutely in terms of the will. July 13, 1894.
Elliott's Trustees v. Elliott.

Mrs Elliott could not, as it appears to me, have discharged had she not been made fiar. But the question is, can the fact that she is made the fiar enable her to discharge as she could not otherwise have done? Or is it not the true view that although her husband has constituted her the fiar the contract restriction must still remain operative—a restriction which limits her powers to the end of protecting her present enjoyment? I think that that question must be answered in accordance with the latter alternative. The husband here had in the marriage-contract exercised his power to dispose of the liferent of his estate for onerous causes, and protected his gift of it against alienation, voluntary or enforced. He had not, as I think, by retaining the power to dispose of the fee after his wife's death, retained to himself the power to revoke and alter what he had already done with the liferent. He could not himself discharge the trustees of their duty, and it is, as I think, very doubtful indeed whether he could by any act of his enable his widow to do so, and thus place her in a position which is inconsistent with the restriction and protection given by the trust conveyance. This trust was a subsisting trust at the time of her husband's death. I cannot hold that leaving a will in her favour could confer upon her a power to bring the trust created by the marriage-contract to an end, and to take without restriction that which she could not so take under that contract. He could of course confer upon her the fee, which she might dispose of as she pleased, even by using her right to it to improve her position financially during her life by conveying it away for a money consideration. But that is not the same thing as taking away the protection of the trust from the alimentary provision.

There is another question. Can it be held that, granted the power existed, the deceased has expressed an intention to do what the second party here maintains that he has done? At the time when the deceased made his will he desired to give to Mrs Elliott all that he had. But what he had was a burdened estate, under which protection was given to a liferent for the wife, both against her own acts and those of others, and he gave it as such, so far as appears. I should be unable to hold that the expressions used by him necessarily implied that he did not wish the protection provided to his widow of an alimentary non-attachable income to be still upheld for her.

I think therefore that the question put in this special case should be answered in the negative.

LORD YOUNG.—I think the most accurate and comprehensive statement of the question in the case is this, What is the construction and legal effect of the will (and codicil) of the deceased George A. Cuming Elliott, having regard to the

No. 192. fact that the testator was married and under contract with his wife, who survived him, by the antenuptial marriage-contract stated in the case? On the one hand it is maintained that the language of the will (and codicil) is so plain that it does not admit of construction, and that in the circumstances the existence of the marriage-contract was no impediment to the testator making the will and codicil according to the plain meaning of the language which he used, and affords no reason for putting a special construction on that language at variance with its usual and ordinary meaning. These circumstances are that there being no children of the marriage the contract at its dissolution subsisted only as a contract between the spouses, and that the predeceasing husband left everything (taking his language in its ordinary sense) to his surviving wife, who is of course willing to accept it. On the other hand, it is maintained that the language employed admits of the construction that the testator's wife should have the property or fee of his estate, but only subject to her own life interest secured to her by the contract, for which purpose the estate itself—i.e., the subjects of the property—must go to the marriage trustees to be held for her during her life, but subject on her decease to her debts and deeds as owner, and that if the testator intended more or other than this his intention was illegal, and therefore inoperative.

July 13, 1894.
Elliott's Trust-
tee v. Elliott.

Now, in the first place, it seems to me clear that if the testator had power, with the assent of his wife (for I assume her assent), to make a will in her favour, according to the plain meaning of the language employed by him in the will in question, it must have effect accordingly. The only reason suggested for denying it effect according to its language, and for putting a special and qualified meaning upon it, is defect of power. The question then comes to be this, Was there such defect of power by reason of the marriage-contract? There is plainly no other reason, and so if this be bad, no reason at all.

I had myself thought it to be a settled rule of law that a marriage-contract had effect and operation as a contract only between the parties to it and the issue of the marriage, who are regarded as parties, and that the parties may, with reference to the event of dissolution of the marriage without issue, modify the contract between themselves as they please, and even cancel it. The rights of children of the marriage, including, as we must now hold to be settled, grandchildren and possibly great-grandchildren, cannot be affected by any subsequent arrangement between the spouses or by the acts of either, but in a case where the marriage is dissolved without issue, the contemplated and provided for possibility of their existence may be disregarded, and so account taken only of the spouses themselves, at least where there are no other contracting parties, such as parents or others who have given funds to be dealt with under the contract.

But we were told that it had been otherwise settled by authority, and we were specially referred to the case of Duthie's Trustee v. Kinloch, June 5, 1873, 5 R. 858, as an authority exactly in point. But the point being whether and how far the power of testing is limited by a marriage-contract to which the testator is a party, I quite fail to see how that case can be an authority upon it, seeing that there was in that case no marriage-contract, and indeed no question whatever of a testator's power to test as he pleased, but only a question regarding the construction and meaning of a particular codicil by a testator whose power to test as he pleased was clearly and admittedly unlimited—certainly not limited by marriage-contract, there being none. I do not think that Duthie's Trustee v. Kinloch has the remotest bearing on the present case.

Is there any other authority for the trustee's contention that by the existence of the marriage-contract the testator was disabled from making the will he did? No. 192. The trustees referred to the case of Hughes v. Edwardes, 19 R. (H. of L.) 33, not indeed for the decision, which was admitted not to be in point, but for some July 13, 1894. Elliott's Trustee v. Elliott. judicial obiter dicta. What I have to say regarding that case may, I think, be usefully prefaced by a few preliminary observations. And, in the first place, I would remark that a trust for the protection of an alimentary liferent (or annuity), and to secure the fee to others on its termination, cannot be terminated without the consent of the truster by an arrangement between the liferenter and fiar. The rule is based on the consideration that the intention of the truster must be regarded and executed, and cannot be defeated by an arrangement to which he is no party, and so can have no application when he is a party to the arrangement or signifies his assent to it in any way. Where such an arrangement has been attempted (as it has repeatedly) before the fee is vested, and it is yet uncertain who will be the fiar, it is of course bad on that ground—it is not an arrangement between the beneficiaries interested. But even where it is vested and all the beneficiaries interested are certain, the arrangement is bad on the rule as a frustration of the truster's intention. The cases usually referred to as examples and illustrations of the rule are cases of testamentary trusts where after the testator's death an arrangement in violation of his intention has been attempted, and these cases can have no bearing on any question regarding the testator's power by will or codicil subsequent to the trust to test as he pleases. He may be deprived of such power by onerous contract or a completely executed gift, which may have been made by a deed of trust, but the cases I am now noticing, relating to the invalidity of an arrangement among beneficiaries or donees to defeat the donor's purpose, can have no bearing on a question regarding a limitation of the donor's own power. In the second place, I have to point out that the only question I am now considering is, whether and to what extent the present testator's power of testing was limited by the marriage-contract to which he was a party? I have thus expressed the question, because it is, I think, clear that his testing power was thereby limited. Without the contract he might have tested as he pleased, leaving his wife to her legal rights of terce and jus relictæ, while with the contract he certainly cannot. He could deprive his wife of nothing to which she had right under the contract, but that on a rule of contract law which is as foreign to the rule which forbids arrangements by beneficiaries under a will in violation of the testator's intentions as one thing can be to another. Then, as regards the validity and effect of the wife's assent to what he has done by his testament in violation of her contract right, it may be valid or not, but must be the one or other on grounds which cannot possibly have been considered or decided in cases about the validity of agreements amongst beneficiaries under a will made after the testator's death, and to which he consequently gave no assent. In saying so I only mean that on the question before us we can have no light from these cases.

When a marriage without issue is dissolved by the predecease of either spouse, leaving a will in favour of the survivor, who assents to it, I venture to submit as sound in law these two propositions—First, that the validity of the will is not affected by the existence of a marriage-contract, to which the spouses were the only parties, and in which at the dissolution of the marriage the survivor alone has an interest; and second, that the construction of the will is not thereby affected, unless indeed the language of the will is such that on the ordinary rules of construction the existence and terms of the contract may afford legitimate assistance in reaching the true meaning and intention of the testator.

Now, is the case of Hughes v. Edwardes adverse to either of these propositions? In that case there was a marriage-contract, whereby the wife conveyed to the marriage trustees a sum of £4000, "paid to her in view of the marriage" by her stepfather, to be held by them for her husband in liferent and the children of the marriage in fee. She predeceased, survived by her husband and a son of the marriage, leaving a will of all she possessed to her husband, and the question in the case, speaking generally, regarded the validity of a demand by the husband, with consent of the son (he being of full age), for immediate payment, and this question was, by the Lord Ordinary and the First Division, and I think also by the House of Lords, dealt with as turning upon whether or not the conditio si sine liberis applied. The First Division, by a majority and reversing the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, held that the conditio did not apply, and so authorised immediate payment. The House of Lords held that the conditio did apply and so reversed the judgment of the First Division. The conditio, if applicable, was of course conclusive, for on that footing the fee was not vested in the son, and might never vest in him, for he might predecease the liferenter leaving issue, who would then be the fee. But it is said that there are obiter dicta in Lord Watson's judgment which shew satisfactorily that he would have disallowed the husband's demand for immediate payment even though the conditio had not applied, on the ground that the terms of a marriage-contract cannot be altered or affected though all the parties to it or interested in it, being sui juris and at large, and never so able to manage their affairs regarding matters of the greatest magnitude, concur. I can find no such obiter dicta. He does indeed refer with emphatic approbation to the decision in Duthie's Trustee v. Kinloch, which I have already noticed, and also to one or two other cases, as distinctly recognising the rule that the beneficiaries in liferent and fee under a beneficent trust cannot by arrangement between themselves after their benefactor's death defeat his distinctly expressed intention. I have shewn, I hope satisfactorily, that this rule has no bearing on either of the two propositions which I have advanced. Lord Watson's reference to it, and statement of his approval of the case of Duthie's Trustee v. Kinloch and other cases which recognised it, is perhaps explained by the first sentence in his judgment, which runs thus—"The appellants, as trustees under an antenuptial contract between Dr and Mrs Edwardes dated 20th February 1855, hold in trust a sum of £4000, which was settled by the lady's stepfather upon the spouses and their children." Had this been so, the rule referred to would have been conclusive of the case, for then the beneficent giver of the £4000 in question, and the party to the marriage-contract with respect to it, being dead, his expressed intentions were protected by the rule, and could not be defeated by an arrangement among the objects of his bounty even on the assumption of vesting and consequent certainty. But it was not so, the fact being, as I have stated, that the money was the wife's, and settled by her. This misapprehension, really unimportant in itself, explains what is said by his Lordship on a rule which otherwise has no very obvious application.

We cannot reject and refuse effect to this will as ultra vires of the testator or put a construction on it at variance with the plain meaning of its clear and familiar language, without affirming some general proposition in law of the greatest, even startling magnitude and importance. What is that proposition?

Rejecting the propositions which I have propounded as in my opinion sound, No. 192. we must affirm others, and they must be of the most general and extensively applicable character, for we are not dealing with a case of special or peculiar features and circumstances. Are we to give it forth that so far as our judgment goes it is a rule of the law of Scotland that a marriage-contract is so lastingly and conclusively binding that the only parties to it, and the only parties interested in it, or who can possibly ever be so, cannot alter it in any particular; and that those who have been by themselves named as trustees under it may always step forward and veto any change? Or is a change impossible only where trustees have been named? Or is this Court to exercise a discretion as to what change may be made and what not?

Elliott's Trustees v. Elliott.

We must in this case act on a rule which by so doing we sanction and proclaim as a general rule, the case being general and in no way special or exceptional. I never saw a more general case or one which must of necessity be decided on a more general and more largely applicable rule of law. Can we limit it to cases where an annuity or liferent is given? On what principle can we do so, assuming that the parties may alter a marriage-contract in which they alone are interested, just as the parties to any other contract may? Are there religious considerations, but these applicable only where a liferent or annuity is given, for which, on religious grounds, no fee whatever can be accepted in substitution, or even, I suppose, a liferent of another property, however much larger and more valuable it may be?

I only wish to say a few words as to the difficulty of imputing to the testator the intention of giving his wife the fee of the estate burdened with the alimentary liferent. The will is an English will, and by the rules of law we must give effect to it as if it were a Scots deed in absence of any proof that the English law attributes a particular meaning to the words used. The language used is,—“I devise and bequeath all my real and personal estate, including any property over which I have power of appointment whatsoever and wheresoever, unto my dear wife absolutely.” There can be no dubiety as to the man's meaning if he has the power. He gives all he possesses to his wife absolutely. Then he calls in a Scots solicitor to give effect to his will. The Scots solicitor proposes a codicil, recalling the appointment of the executor by the English will, and appointing the wife as “the sole executor of my said will.” The meaning imputed by the first party to the codicil is that the testator appointed his wife to be his executor to ingather his estate, and hand it over to the marriage-contract trustee to hold for her alimentary use during her life. I must say that to impute such an intention to the maker of the will and codicil in my opinion approaches the ridiculous.

I am therefore of opinion that it was the intention of the testator that his wife should have the unburdened fee of his estate, that the will and codicil were not in excess of the power of the testator, and that they should receive effect.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—By antenuptial marriage-contract Mr Elliott disposed his whole estate to trustees for payment to himself during his lifetime, and after his death to his wife if she should survive him, “of the free annual income thereof, for the liferent and alimentary use allenary of them and the survivor of them, declaring that the same shall not be affectable by the debts or deeds of either of them, or the diligence of their creditors.” The fee was settled on the children of the marriage, and in the event of there being none, the trustees

No. 192. were directed, on the death of Mrs Elliott, to convey the estate to the heirs and assignees of Mr Elliott.
 July 13, 1894. Elliott's Trustees v. Elliott.

The conveyance contained in the contract came into operation on the celebration of the marriage. The question which we are asked to determine is whether the trustees are bound to denude. Mrs Elliott survived her husband, and thus became entitled to the alimentary liferent. There were no children of the marriage, consequently the fee was not disposed of by the marriage-contract. It remained in Mr Elliott.

By his will Mr Elliott devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to his wife absolutely. He makes no reference to the marriage-contract.

The question before us is, whether Mrs Elliott can require the trustees to denude in her favour, with the necessary effect of extinguishing her alimentary liferent? She maintains that they are bound to do so by reason of her husband's will, by which he has made her absolute fiar, and by which, as she contends, he has signified his consent that the liferent should be terminated.

We have not to consider the question whether the spouses had the power of altering the marriage-contract during the subsistence of the marriage. They made no attempt to do so, and I think that there can be no doubt that on the dissolution of the marriage Mrs Elliott took under the contract an alimentary liferent in her husband's estate. It is not, I think, difficult to determine the legal qualities of that right. The liferent is created and secured by the constitution of a trust. By the trust-deed it is declared that it shall not be affected by her debts or deeds, or by the diligence of her creditors. In my opinion it is an estate which she cannot assign, renounce, or discharge. This is, I think, well-settled law, and I need cite no other authority than the cases of Rennie, in the House of Lords, April 25, 1845, 4 Bell, 221 (17 Scot. Jur. 332), and of White, 4 R. 786, as well as the case of Hughes, to which I shall have occasion afterwards to refer.

Mrs Elliott does not contend that as a mere alimentary liferenter she can put an end to the liferent, nor, in my opinion, could she maintain with success that she is entitled to require the trustees to denude from the mere fact that she has come to have right to the fee. That fact could not justify any such demand unless she could shew that of legal necessity the liferent perishes by being merged in the fee. I see no reason for thinking that there is any such necessity. The trust-deed was constituted in order to the creation and protection of the liferent, and was probably essential for that purpose. So long as it exists the benefits of the liferent are secured to the liferenter. The legal title is in the trustees, and Mrs Elliott, whether as liferenter or as fiar, has nothing more than a claim against them. These claims are distinct, and with the legal title in the trustees there is no difficulty in keeping them distinct and in maintaining both.

I do not mean to suggest that the beneficial fee is not vested in Mrs Elliott. The fact that she has an alimentary liferent over it is no impediment to the condition that the liferent must be preserved. Mrs Elliott has the full fee. She may dispose of it as she sees fit, and it may, I think, be attached by her creditors. But her deeds and the diligence of creditors will be postponed to the liferent, and will be suspended until the liferent terminates. In other words, the fee cannot be disposed of or attached to the detriment of the alimentary liferent. But there is no other limitation on the rights of the fiar or of the creditors of the fiar.

The argument on which Mrs Elliott relied was that both the spouses consented to the discharge of the liferent. I do not require to consider the question whether the liferent could be terminated with the joint assent of the spouses. For in my opinion the argument fails on the fact. I am unable to read the will as signifying Mr Elliott's consent to the determination of the alimentary liferent. I think that it expresses no more than that his wife should have all the estate which he had the power to convey, or, in other words, the estate burdened with the alimentary liferent. Such a liferent secures her due support and maintenance after his death. He made this provision for her in his marriage-contract, and I do not think that he meant to alter it by a will which makes no reference to that contract, and which can receive full effect consistently with the preservation of the liferent. He merely made an addition to those rights which were already vested in her by giving her a power of disposing of the fee. He has signified nothing more than that she should have both the alimentary liferent and the fee. I do not attach importance to the use of the word "absolutely." A fee and an absolute fee are precisely the same. I do not think that Mr Elliott in giving the fee absolutely intended to distinguish the right he was then giving from the right given under the marriage-contract, or to indicate that he was substituting the one for the other. It seems to me that he meant no more than to declare that he did not by his will impose any limitations on the fee which he thereby gave.

No. 192.

Elliott's Trustees v. Elliott.

We are not without authority, and to my mind conclusive authority. In the case of Hughes, Lord Watson, with the concurrence of the other noble Lords, said,—“The learned Judges of the Inner-House who decided in favour of the pursuers do not suggest that a trust duly constituted for payment of an alimentary annuity can be brought to an end by the joint action of the annuitant and the parties having beneficial right to the fee. A rule to the contrary has long been settled, and was recently enforced in White's Trustees v. Whyte, 4 R. 786, and Duthie's Trustees v. Kinloch, 5 R. 858. In both instances the parties entitled to the fee had a vested interest, which is not the case here; and in Duthie's Trustees v. Kinloch the alimentary liferenter and the beneficial fiar were one and the same person. Yet it was held that the combined action of all parties interested could not defeat the settler's intention to make the annuitant's right alimentary, a result which could not be attained except by continuing the trust.”

The language seems to me to be conclusive of the present case. For, of course, it did not escape the notice of Lord Watson in Duthie's case that the limited right and the fee were created by the same person, and I take him to mean that a person who has created an alimentary liferent by means of a trust does not put an end to that liferent by giving the fee to the liferenter. It is said that it was merely obiter, and that is true in the sense that the case was decided on another ground. But to my mind it is not the less authoritative. It is the statement of what the House regarded as a well-settled rule, and in my opinion I should be bound to follow that rule, even if I were not convinced that it was sound.

It was urged that Lord Watson mistook the import of the case of Duthie, when he said that the Court held that a trust could not be determined when the alimentary liferenter and the beneficial fiar were one and the same person. It is true that in that case there was no liferent. The truster had directed that an alimentary annuity should be purchased for his sister, and that the title to the annuity should be taken in the names of the trustees. By a subsequent codicil he revoked the residuary clause of his trust-deed, and left the whole residue to his sister. There could be no doubt that the whole estate belonged to her partly as an annuity and partly as residue, and that if the annuity was not to be bought, she was fiar of the money which would have been required to purchase it. If she could sell or discharge the annuity she would have been entitled to prevent the trustees from purchasing, and to require them to denude. For the Court will not allow trustees to do against the wish of a beneficiary what the beneficiary can undo. But the Court refused to pronounce such an order, because they were of opinion that she could not discharge the annuity. I do not think that there was any doubt on this question. The only point which was discussed was, whether the direction to purchase an annuity was revoked by the subsequent codicil.

In a question of this nature I see no difference between an alimentary annuity to be bought from the estate of which the annuitant is owner, and an alimentary liferent on an estate of which the liferenter is the fiar, so that the language of Lord Watson if erroneous in form is, to my mind, accurate in substance. But were it otherwise, we have the expression of a distinct opinion, in which the other noble Lords concurred, that where a trust is constituted in order to the creation of an alimentary liferent, the trust cannot be brought to an end because the liferent and fee happen to coalesce in the same person. I should be very unwilling to decide to the contrary.

Holding, therefore, that the liferent does not perish by the fact that Mrs Elliott is beneficial fiar, and that Mr Elliott has not signified his consent to the termination of the liferent, I am of opinion that Mrs Elliott cannot require the trustees to surrender. I have not entered on the question whether such consent would avail her. I think it better to reserve my opinion. My impression is that it would not. I do not see how he could by his will alter the quality of the estate which had vested in her at his death, or how he could empower her to renounce the alimentary liferent secured to her by the marriage-contract.

LORD ADAM.—My opinion is in accordance with that of Lord Young.

LORD M'LAREN.—My opinion coincides with that of Lord Young and Lord Adam.

The first question is the question of intention. The testator in his will does not use the word fee, or residue, or reversion, or any equivalent term, but professes to give to his wife his "real and personal estate absolutely." He adds, parenthetically, that he includes any property over which he has the power of appointment. If these words are not sufficient to express an unqualified gift of the testator's estate, then the English language must be incapable of expressing the distinction between a universal legacy and a gift of the same estate burdened by a liferent.

On the second point, I have always understood that alimentary conditions were effectual in law as being conditions of the gift or contract to which they relate, and I cannot assent to the description of an alimentary right as a particular kind of estate in any other sense than that it is a conditional gift. If a father in his lifetime puts a sum of money into the hands of trustees to provide an alimentary life interest to his son, it is, I think, self-evident that the father and son by their joint act can put an end to the trust. They alone are interested in its fulfilment, and the father's consent is of course sufficient to release the son from his obligation not to assign the life interest or to allow it to be carried away by creditors.

The reason why alimentary trusts are indissoluble when constituted by will is that the testator being dead, his consent to the revocation of the alimentary trust cannot be obtained. This is the only legal proposition which I can extract from Duthie's Trustees and similar cases; the question in such cases always is, whether the testator meant by his codicil to revoke the alimentary liferent and to give the fund in property, or whether he meant the legatee to take an alimentary liferent and a fee concurrently.

But in the present case the alimentary liferent was constituted by a marriage-contract, and its efficacy depends on contract. Supposing there were no trust, but only an obligation to provide an alimentary liferent, there is no reason that I can discover why the husband and wife during the subsistence of the marriage should not by their joint act discharge the obligation. Such a discharge would of course be revocable by the wife on the ground of donatio inter virum et uxorem, but if the husband gave her a better provision she would not be likely to exercise the right of revocation.

Now, in the present case there is in the contract of marriage the form of a conveyance to trustees. But then, it is a conveyance of the husband's whole estate, and it is a settled point in the law of marriage-contracts that such a trust only comes into operation on the husband's death.

Accordingly, it appears to me that in the present case it was quite open to the wife, upon the terms of her husband's will (and codicil) being made known to her, to elect to take under the will (and codicil) instead of taking under the marriage-contract. If my view upon the first point be correct, she could not take under both instruments, but her husband's will (and codicil) on that view is a discharge of the alimentary condition so far as he is concerned, and the wife's election to take under the will (and codicil) is a discharge of the condition on her part. No human being is interested in the fund except the spouses, and there are no trustees put into possession in Mr Elliott's lifetime who could interfere with their action.

The trustee very properly states that he is willing that Mrs Elliott should have the capital, but he does not feel at liberty to part with it unless with the authority of the Court. He only comes into possession on Mr Elliott's death, and his possession for purposes of administration of the real and personal estate left by Mr Elliott can be no bar to the exercise of Mrs Elliott's election to accept the testamentary gift of her husband's estate. In such circumstances I cannot help thinking that the right claimed by Mrs Elliott is demonstrably clear.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord Rutherford Clark. I admit the force of the argument that the parties to a contract may in general by mutual consent alter or cancel stipulations which they themselves have made and in which no other person is interested. I do not, however, think it necessary to determine the conditions under which that doctrine will avail to put an end to a trust which has once been effectually constituted for the protection of an alimentary liferent. To make any agreement effectual for that purpose it must be made quite clear, not only that the parties interested have consented, but also that they all have power to consent, and it appears to me very doubtful, in the present case, whether the wife had such power. But the husband and wife have made no agreement to cancel the stipulation of their marriage-contract, that the income of the trust-estate should be an alimentary provision for the wife in case of her survivance, and should not be affectable by her debts or deeds or the diligence of her creditors. The question is whether the husband has cancelled it by the terms of a bequest in his will.

Elliott's Trustee v. Elliott.

Now, if he had declared in terms that the stipulation should have no force and had revoked the conveyance in trust for that purpose, I think that that declaration of his will would have been inoperative, and that his wife's right would have remained exactly as it stood under the marriage-contract. A husband may of course give his wife more by will than he has undertaken to give her by contract, and therefore he may liberate her from a mere restriction upon her enjoyment of his estate which has been laid upon her for the protection of other interests which have been determined or have never emerged, and not for her own benefit. But the stipulation in question is not a mere restriction. It is a stipulation for the benefit of the wife that her life interest shall be protected from the diligence of her creditors. I do not understand it to be maintained that the husband could, without her own consent, deprive her of the benefit of this protection for which she and her father—who was a party to the contract—have formally stipulated. But I hardly see how the argument can stop short of that contention. For the argument is that by his will he has given her power to consent to the abolition of the restriction, and the validity of the restriction depends entirely on the stipulation that she shall have no such power. It is not the absence of her consent, but her incapacity to consent, which excludes her creditors from attaching the life interest. It is perfectly well settled, and indeed it is elementary, that money or estate of any kind cannot be placed extra commercium and exempted from the diligence of creditors so long as the person to whom it belongs has power to dispose of it at pleasure. This is the principle on which it was held in White's Trustees v. Whyte that the only way in which an alimentary right can be effectually created is that which was adopted in the marriage-contract in question,—that is, by the constitution of a trust under which the trustees are prohibited from giving any effect to the claim of assignees or arresting creditors, and which the life renter or annuitant is effectually debarred from discharging. It appears to me to follow that the husband cannot liberate his wife from the restraints involved in the alimentary character of his right without necessarily, and at the same time, depriving her of the protection for which she had stipulated, and opening the estate by his will to the diligence of her creditors. A trust which she has power to determine at pleasure is totally ineffectual for the purpose for which it was created, and therefore if the husband by his will has given that power to the wife, the stipulation for the protection of her life interest from creditors is no longer of any validity whatever, whether she desires to avail herself of the power or not. It appears to me that if the meaning of the will is to give the wife an absolute and uncontrolled power of disposal, not only of the fee, but also of the life interest, it must either be held that the testator has cancelled the protection from creditors by his own act, or else that the bequest is altogether inoperative to alter or affect the alimentary right.

But, however that may be, I agree with Lord Rutherford Clark that the husband's will does not purport to relieve the wife of the conditions or deprive her of the protection attached by contract to her life interest right. The estate which he could dispose of by will consisted of the fee under burden of the life interest. That appears to me to be all that is carried by the will. There could be no question either as to the construction of the words of bequest or as to their legal effect, if the will had been in favour of a stranger, and I think it makes no difference that it is in favour of the wife. It would have made a very material difference if the bequest of the fee in favour of the life renter carried with it by necessary implication the determination of all conditions and limitations affecting her life-rent enjoyment. But I think it must be taken as settled law that when a person who is vested in an alimentary life-rent acquires the fee by a separate title, the two rights are not merged as in the case of a simple life-rent, but co-exist in the same person as separate and distinct rights. I agree with what Lord Rutherford Clark has said as to the case of Duthie, and as to Lord Watson's observations upon that case in Hughes v. Edwardes. The distinction that has been taken between these cases and the present is no doubt just so far as it goes. They do not decide that the persons who have imposed a restriction by contract may not remove it by mutual consent. But they decide that an alimentary right which is effectually protected by a trust may still subsist under the conditions by which it was originally limited, notwithstanding that the life-renter has acquired an absolute right in the fee. Now, there is nothing in the will we are construing to affect the alimentary character of the life-rent except the absolute terms of the bequest. If that does not by itself merge the life-rent in the fee, and give the wife the whole estate by a new title, there is nothing from which it can be inferred that the testator intended to deprive his wife of the protection provided by the marriage-contract, or that he had adverted at all to the conditions attaching to her rights under the marriage-contract in bequeathing to her, in addition to what was secured to her by contract, all the estate he had power to dispose of by will. I think the word "absolutely," upon which so much stress was laid in argument, has no reference to the life-rent, with which the will has no concern, but only to the estate which the testator had power to dispose of. The legatee's right in that estate is to be absolute and unlimited. But that does not affect the separate right, which he had no power to give or take away. I do not see that the case raises any question of election. I think the wife shall take the life-rent by virtue of her marriage-contract, as she would have done if the fee had been bequeathed to a stranger, and that she takes nothing under the will except the fee already burdened by her life-rent right.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Rutherford Clark.

DAVID IRELAND & SON, Pursuers (Respondents).—Ure—Aitken.
MERRYTON COAL COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—D. Dundas—Salvesen.

Contract—Construction—Reparation—Measure of damages.—A coal company contracted to supply a firm of coal-merchants with 3000 tons of coal at 7s. per ton to be delivered "over the next four months" in "average" or "about equal" monthly quantities, and in shipping lots of from 400 to 600 tons, due notice being given.

The sellers having at the end of the period of four months delivered only about half of the 3000 tons, the buyers brought an action of damages against them, in which the pursuers calculated the damages on the basis of the market price ruling at the end of the four months for the whole coal undelivered.

Held (rev. the judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling) that under the contract the defenders were bound to deliver, and the pursuers entitled to receive, no more than about 750 tons of coal during each of the four months over which the contract extended; that the pursuers had no right to call on the defenders to make up in succeeding months for quantities short delivered in earlier months, but that it was the duty of the pursuers to buy in against the defenders at the end of each month for the quantity short delivered during that month, through the fault of the defenders, and therefore that the amount of damages was to be calculated on the basis of the market price ruling at the end of each month for the quantity short delivered during that month.

2D DIVISION.
LdStormonth-
Darling.

ON 1st May 1893 David Ireland & Son, coal-merchants, Dundee, wrote to the Merryton Coal Company, coalmasters, near Hamilton,—“We have an inquiry for Hamilton Ell, shipment during the next few months, and might arrange 3000 tons at 7s. f.o.b. Grangemouth, in lots of 4/600 tons.”

On 2d May the Merryton Coal Company replied,—“We would take the 3000 tons Ell coal at 7s. per ton f.o.b. G'mouth, for delivery over next four months in average monthly quantities. Delivery in shipping lots of 4/600 tons at a time on due notice being given. We don't guarantee delivery during strikes or stoppage of pits.”

On 8th May Ireland & Son wrote,—“We have now succeeded in placing the 3000 tons of Ell, and accept this quantity at 7s. f.o.b. Grangemouth, delivery in about equal monthly quantities over the next four months.”

The Merryton Coal Company replied next day,—“We have your memo. of 8th inst., and confirm same in terms of our offer of 2d inst.”

There was no delivery under this contract during the month of May, Ireland & Son having no vessel on which to ship the coal, and the Merryton Coal Company making no tender of delivery. In June Ireland & Son asked for only one shipment of coal, amounting to 426 tons 8 cwts., and this they got from the Merryton Coal Company. During the months of July and August, Ireland & Son asked for delivery of quantities in all considerably exceeding the average of 750 tons a-month, but received in July 261 tons 5 cwts. less than that amount, and in August 70 tons 14 cwts. less. On 28th August the Merryton Coal Company wrote to Ireland & Son intimating that they held themselves bound to deliver at the rate of 750 tons a-month only, and declining to make up for short deliveries during the three earlier months. The total amount delivered was 1594 tons 9 cwts., leaving 1405 tons 11 cwts. undelivered.

On 4th December 1893, Ireland & Son brought an action against the Merryton Coal Company concluding for payment of £238, 17s. The greater part of this sum was sued for as damages for failure to deliver the 1405 tons 11 cwts. of coal. The amount of these damages was calculated at the rate of 3s. 3d. a ton, being the difference between the contract price of 7s. a ton, and the market price of 10s. 3d. a ton at the end of August.

The pursuers maintained that the contract was one for the sale of 3000 tons of coal in all, delivery to be reasonably spread over the period of the contract, so that deliveries short of 750 tons in all in one month should be made up in the succeeding months, and consequently that the damages for the total short deliveries at the end of the period of the contract should be estimated at the market rate then ruling.

In defence the Merryton Coal Company maintained that they were bound to deliver, and the pursuers entitled to receive, no more than about 750 tons of coal during each of the four months over which the contract extended; that consequently it was the duty of the pursuers to buy in against the defenders at the end of each month for the quantity short delivered during that month through the fault of the defenders, and that the pursuers had no right to call on the defenders to make up in succeeding months for quantities short delivered in earlier months. The defenders, therefore, contended that the amount of the damages ought to be calculated on the basis of the market price ruling at the end of each month for the quantity (if any) short delivered during that month through their fault.

v. Merryton
Coal Co.

After a proof, from which the foregoing facts, in so far as they had been in dispute appeared, and from which it further appeared that the market price of coal at the end of July was 1s. in advance of the contract price, the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling), on 20th March 1894, pronounced an interlocutor, finding the defenders liable in £106, 10s. as damages to the pursuers.*

* "OPINION.— . . . I do not think that each month's delivery was a hard and fast quantity of 750 tons, and that a portion remaining undelivered at the end of any month was necessarily wiped out of the contract without reference to the cause of non-delivery. In short, I regard the contract as one contract, and not four contracts; but I think that the deliveries were to be spread over the months of May, June, July, and August, in nearly equal proportions, with the result that, if the purchaser failed to take something like the proper proportion in any month, he was not entitled to demand delivery of that quantity in succeeding months, and that if the seller failed to give delivery of the proper proportion for any month when asked, he was not thereby relieved of the duty of delivering that quantity, but must make it up as soon as possible, provided the purchaser were still willing to take it.

"Now, the facts are these: In their letter of 9th May confirming the contract, the sellers asked Ireland when his first boat was expected, so that they might prepare. The answer next day was that he hoped to send the first order in a day or two, but that the navigation to Cronstadt was reported still unsafe. On 17th and 27th May the sellers repeated their inquiry, but not till 7th June did Ireland send his first order, and that was for a vessel not expected to be ready till 13th or 14th June. It may be that the state of the Baltic made it difficult to procure tonnage, but the sellers have proved that six vessels sailed from Grangemouth for Cronstadt in May 1893, taking large cargoes of coal; and in any case I do not see that the purchaser can be relieved on that ground from the consequences of what was clearly a breach of contract on his part. The sellers did not at once intimate that they regarded the first month's instalment as cancelled, but the result, I think, was the same, unless they chose to carry forward the delivery. So far from being willing to do that, the whole subsequent correspondence consisted of demands for coal by Ireland to an extent considerably exceeding the contract quantity, and excuses by the sellers for non-delivery, except of comparatively small shipments, on the ground that their men were not working full time. It is in evidence that during the summer of 1893 there were difficulties with the miners in the west of Scotland, but the Merryton Company's average output was something like 400 tons a-week, and I have heard no satisfactory reason why the deliveries were not much larger than they were. On the whole, down to the last delivery in the early part of September, the quantity delivered was 1594 tons 9 cwt. The balance undelivered was thus 1405 tons 11 cwt. From this I deduct 750 tons, as representing the quantity which Ireland failed to take in May, leaving 655 tons 11 cwt. for non-delivery of which I hold the Merryton Company responsible.

"In the view which I take of the case, it is unnecessary to analyse the correspondence, or to inquire how far short of the required quantity the Merryton Company were in any particular month. From the beginning of June onwards they were, I think, continuously in default. The only remaining question is whether the purchaser was bound to treat them as in default at the end of each month, and buy in against them at once, or was entitled to wait until the termination of the contract. I do not doubt that when a seller inti-

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—Under the contract they were bound to deliver to the pursuers 3000 tons of coal in quantities of about 750 tons, during each of the months of May, June, July, and August. The mention of the lots of 4/600 tons was merely a protective clause in their favour, so that they should not be called upon to deliver more than the output would admit of. Although the contract was one contract it had four periods, at each of which any damage for breach fell to be assessed. The principle adopted by the Lord Ordinary of accumulating the damage until the termination of the contract was erroneous. The proper measure of damage was the sum of the differences between the contract price and the market price upon the last day of the particular month in which the shortage occurred.¹ Lord Selborne's dictum in the *Mersey Steel and Iron Company*² case was obiter, and in any view had reference to the particular contract before him. *Ogle's*³ case had no application. In it there was a pactional modification of the bargain in the shape of an agreement by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant to postpone the delivery during the contract. There were here no letters instructing any forbearance on the part of the pursuer at the request of the defenders.⁴

Argued for the pursuers;—The contract was a unum quid for the sale of 3000 tons of coal, and no less, to be delivered in equal quantities of 750 tons, if possible, during the four months, with exceptions which excused the sellers from delivery during the actual period of the contract.⁵ If, then, the quantity asked for and got was less than the monthly quantity of 750 tons, then the quantity short delivered was to be made up by the sellers at the end of the contract. The Lord Ordinary's judgment was therefore right,⁶—the law of *Brown's*⁶ and *Roper's*⁷ cases was not disputed. It might well be that where a seller said he was not going to deliver, then that was the period at which the buyer must go into the market and buy in against him in order to constitute the damage. Here there was no absolute refusal to deliver till 28th August; the defenders merely made excuses for their delay, and it appeared from the correspondence that in respect of their excuses the pursuers forbore to press mates unequivocally that he intends to make no more deliveries it is the right and duty of the purchaser forthwith to buy in against him at the market price of the day. But that rule applies to the case where there is an absolute repudiation of the contract. I do not find in this correspondence any positive refusal on the part of the sellers to make further deliveries until their letter of 28th August. The contract was treated by both parties as in full vitality till then, and although the sellers had once or twice asserted their view that they were not bound to deliver more than 750 tons per month, these were rather of the nature of excuses for short deliveries, and not binding declarations on which the other party would have been justified in acting.

"I hold it proved that at the end of August the price of Ell coal had risen from 7s. to 10s. 3d. a ton, and Ireland is therefore entitled to the difference of 3s. 3d. on 655 tons 11 cwt., being £106, 10s."

for the full monthly instalments, but always subject to their right to obtain ultimately the full amount of their contract. The measure of damages was thus the difference between the contract and market price as at 31st August.¹ Lastly, under the contract there were certain excepted causes excusing delivery by the defenders, e.g., stoppages of pits and strikes. Under these causes the quantities short delivered were not wiped out of the contract, but the delivery of them was merely postponed.²

LORD TRAYNER.—This is an action of damages for breach of contract, and the questions for determination are,—(1) What is the contract between the parties? (2) have the defenders (the sellers) committed a breach of the contract? and (3) if so, what damage is due to the pursuers (the buyers) in respect of said breach?

1. The contract between the parties is contained in the seller's letter of 2d May 1893 and the buyer's reply on 8th May following, the first of these letters being in effect an offer which by the second letter was accepted. The contract was this: The defenders undertook to deliver to the pursuers 3000 tons Ell coal at 7s. per ton f.o.b. Grangemouth, to be delivered over the "next four months" in average (or "about equal") monthly quantities; and to be delivered in shipping lots of from 400 to 600 tons at a time on due notice being given.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that this was one contract for the whole 3000 tons of coal, and not four contracts, each for 750 tons. I think this is quite clear. But it is equally clear that while the contract was for 3000 tons, it was a contract for the delivery of that quantity not in lump but in four monthly quantities of equal or about equal extent. Accordingly what the defenders were bound to deliver, and the pursuers entitled to demand, was 3000 tons of coal in quantities of about 750 tons during each month over which the contract extended. So far I think parties are practically agreed.

2. Did the defenders commit a breach of their contract? In the month of May the pursuers were not in a position (from want of a vessel) to take delivery of any coal, and they asked for none. The defenders tendered none, because, I suppose, they could otherwise dispose of the produce of their colliery during that month. But there was no breach of contract in not delivering what the pursuers did not want, did not ask for, and could not take. In June the pursuers asked for one shipment and got it. Again there was no breach of contract. In July demands were made for the whole monthly quantity which the defenders failed to deliver to the extent (as is agreed) of 262 tons; while in August there was delivery only of the monthly quantity, less 71 tons. Accordingly there was a breach of contract on the part of the defenders in the months of July and August, for which they must answer. And that leads to the third question.

3. What amount of damage must the defenders pay in respect of such breach? The Lord Ordinary has answered this question by finding that the defenders are liable to the pursuers in 3s. per ton on each ton of the whole 3000 short delivered, 3s. per ton being the difference between the contract rate and the market price of the same coal on 1st September, the day after the contract period expired, his view being that under the contract the defenders were bound to deliver 3000 tons in all, and that what was not delivered in one month should have been delivered in another. I am unable to concur in that view of the contract. I have already stated that in my opinion the contract was one for delivery of 3000 tons of coal, but for delivery of that cumulo quantity in about equal quantities in each of the four specified months. Even these monthly quantities could only be demanded in shipping lots of from 400 to 600 tons "on due notice being given," so that the pursuers had no right to demand, and the defenders no obligation to deliver the whole monthly quantity at one time. The defenders fulfilled their obligation if they gave 400 tons at one time on due notice being given to them. But there is no stipulation that if the quantity asked for or got in one month was less than the monthly quantity agreed on, such quantity short delivered was to be made up in the following month, or otherwise during the currency of the contract. If that had been intended I should have expected to find it expressed, or something at all events leading by clear implication to the view that that was the contract intention of the parties. There is, however, nothing of the kind. The want of such a stipulation did the pursuers no harm if they wanted the whole coal they had contracted for within the contract time. For each month that there was a short delivery they could have gone into the market and bought in coal to supply the deficiency at the defenders' expense. Just as, on the other hand, the defenders could have sold elsewhere any coal which the pursuers did not take, and charged them with the difference between the price obtained and the contract price, had the former been less than the latter. In a word, the contract was for monthly deliveries of about 750 tons of coal until 3000 tons had been delivered between 1st May and 31st August. Each monthly delivery was separate and separable, although the rights and obligations hinc inde arose out of one contract for 3000 tons of coal. If this view of the contract be the right one, the damage due by the defenders for breach of contract is easily ascertained. There was no breach in May or June. In July there was a breach in respect of a short delivery of 262 tons. On 1st August the market price of the coals was 1s. per ton in advance of the contract price, and at that price the pursuers could have bought in against the short delivery. Had they done so, they would have been in the same position as if the defenders had fulfilled their contract, but this would have cost them £13, 2s., and that is the amount of their damage. In like manner there was a breach of contract in August by a short delivery of 71 tons. The market had advanced 3s. per ton on the contract rate; the pursuers therefore could have supplied the deficiency at a cost of £10, 13s., which is their damage in August through the defenders' breach. I think the pursuers have thus sustained damage through the defenders' breach of contract to the extent of £23, 15s.

LORD YOUNG, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and assessed the damages due by the defenders to the pursuers at £23, 15s.

Trust—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 97), sec. 7—Advances out of income for maintenance of beneficiaries.—The Trusts Act, 1867, sec. 7, enacts,—“The Court may from time to time, under such conditions as they see fit, authorise trustees to advance any part of the capital of a fund destined, either absolutely or contingently, to minor descendants of the truster, being beneficiaries having a vested interest in such fund, if it shall appear that the income of the fund is insufficient or not applicable to, and that such advance is necessary for, the maintenance or education of such beneficiaries, or any of them, and that it is not expressly prohibited by the trust-deed, and that the rights of parties other than the heirs or representatives of such minor beneficiaries shall not be thereby prejudiced.”

Testamentary trustees held the residue of a trust-estate for behoof of the testator's children, who were all minors, subject to a direction to divide it among the children or the survivors, when the youngest child should reach twenty-one years of age. The settlement contained a declaration that the provisions to the children should not become vested interests in them until the period of division, and there was no direction as to the application of the accruing income. There was no destination over in the event of the children all dying before the date of division.

A petition was presented by the trustees for authority to apply the whole of the income, or such part thereof as they should think proper, for behoof of the children, on the ground that this was necessary for their maintenance and education.

Held that the petition might be granted under sec. 7 of the Trusts Act, 1867, in respect (1) that the unappropriated income formed part of the capital; (2) that although the interest of each child was contingent, and had not vested, the children as a class had a vested interest in the sense of the statute; (3) that no persons had an interest in the residue other than the children and their heirs or representatives, as in the event of all the children dying before the provisions vested, the residue would fall to be dealt with as intestate succession of the testator, and would be payable to the representatives of the children, his next of kin.

THIS petition was presented by the testamentary trustees of the late David Ross, and by Arthur William Ross and Montague Armitage Ross, two of his children, for authority to the trustees to make certain payments from the trust-funds for behoof of the testator's children, who were all in minority. 1ST DIVISION.

David Ross died at Edinburgh on 5th March 1893 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement whereby he conveyed to trustees his whole means and estate, and directed them to pay to his widow the annual profits or produce of the residue of his estate under the declaration that she should be bound to aliment, maintain, and educate the children of the marriage until they should be able to maintain themselves. In the fourth purpose of the deed he provided as follows:—“That my trustees shall hold the residue of my whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, for behoof of the children that may be born of the marriage between me and my said wife, and shall, after the death of the longest liver of me and my said spouse . . . divide and apportion my whole estate and effects, heritable and moveable, equally among my whole children to be born of the marriage between me and my said wife; but declaring that such apportionment and division shall only then take place provided the youngest of our children alive at the time shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, and if not, shall be postponed until the youngest of the survivors of them shall attain that age, with power, nevertheless, to my said trustees, with the consent and approbation of my said spouse, in the event of her surviving me . . . to advance to my son or sons such part of their provisions as to my trustees shall seem proper for apprenticing them or otherwise fitting them out in life, which advances shall form preferable claims against and be deducted from his or their proportion of the residue of my said estate payable to him or them; declaring that the provisions to my said children shall not become vested interests in them until the term of division of my said estate above mentioned; but declaring, nevertheless, that in the event of any of my said children dying before the said term of division, and leaving lawful issue, such issue shall be entitled to their parent's share, and the same shall be divided equally among his or her issue alive at the period of payment or conveyance, and failing such issue, the share of such child deceasing shall fall and accresce to the survivors, and be payable to them on the same condition as their original shares."

The truster was survived by his widow, by a son, Arthur William, born on 20th June 1875, and by two daughters, Montague Armitage, and Isobel Mary, born respectively on 3d September 1877 and 3d March 1885.

The trustees paid the widow the annual income arising from the residue until her death, which took place on 27th April 1894.

The petitioners stated that the estate consisted of moveable property to the value of about £2600, and that the annual income, about £78, was the whole sum available for the maintenance and education of the children. They also stated that the deed conferred no express power upon the trustees to apply the income of the estate for the benefit of the children until the period of vesting had arrived, which was not until the youngest of them attained the age of twenty-one complete, i.e., until 3d March 1906. They therefore craved the Court to authorise and appoint them to apply the whole or such part as they might think proper, of the income of the trust-estate for behoof of the children.

After the petition had been intimated, the Court remitted to Mr A. H. Cooper, W.S., to report.

Mr Cooper reported generally in favour of the granting of the prayer, and pointed out that the children were without guardians for the purpose of the application, and that the parties who would be the nearest of kin in the event of the death of the children were not called.

Counsel for the petitioners referred to the 7th section of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867,* and to the undernoted cases.¹

LORD M'LAREN.—Our power to grant this application depends on the authority given to the Court by the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, which in form relates only to advances out of capital. But as the income of this estate is unappropriated, of course as each year's income accrues it is the duty of the trustees to add it to the capital to increase the amount of the residue. It is the right and duty of trustees to accumulate undisposed of income with capital, and therefore I think this application is quite within the scope of the Act of Parliament, which deals with the unappropriated capital of trust-estates.

Now, not to repeat the words of the clause, the conditions of a valid application to the Court are that the class of children—the family of children—must have an interest in the trust-fund, and that no other persons can shew an interest under the deed. If these conditions exist the Court may grant the trustees power to make advances from the capital of the estate, even though the interest of any individual child may be contingent, because it is so put in the statute. The object of this remedial provision is to avoid the difficulty which arises, where, owing to the existence of a clause of survivorship as between children, it would not be held that a right to an absolute share vested in each child at the testator's death. But the statute recognises that, provided the children, as a family, have the sole interest in the fund, and that there are no other funds applicable to their maintenance, power to apply this common fund may be granted. Now, I think we have before us exactly the case which the Act contemplates. There is no destination over in this deed, and if the children were all to die in minority the only persons who could claim this fund would be the next of kin. These are the children themselves, and although in the case I am putting they are all dead, their collateral relatives do not take as next of kin in their own right but as representing the children. This was established in the case of Lord v. Colvin (Dec. 7, 1860, 23 D. 111), and the principle was recognised in the very carefully considered judgment of the House of Lords in Gregory's Trustees v. Alison (April 8, 1889, 16 R. (H. L.) p. 10), and it therefore appears to me to be quite unnecessary to call the next of kin of the children for whose behoof this application is made. The same considerations render it unnecessary to appoint a curator ad litem, because, according to the report which is before us, there is no other source of maintenance open to these children. The application is for their benefit, and my opinion, which I understand your Lordships agree with, is that it would be unnecessary to appoint a curator ad litem, except for the protection of some interest in the children themselves. I am therefore of opinion that we may now grant the power craved.

 July 17, 1894.
 Lord Advocate
 v. Wilson.

The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, sec. 11, subsec. 2, amends the above quoted section thus,—“ . . . The description of property marked (c) shall be construed as if the expression ‘voluntary settlement’ included any trust, whether expressed in writing or otherwise, in favour of a volunteer, and if contained in a deed or other instrument effecting the settlement, whether such deed or other instrument was made for valuable consideration or not as between the settlor and any other person, and as if the expression ‘such property,’ wherever the same occurs, included the proceeds of sale thereof.”

In 1887 W transferred to three of his sons, who formed a copartnership, the whole stock in trade and goodwill of his business. No cash was paid down by his sons, but they undertook, both as individuals and as a firm, to grant a bond of annuity in favour of their father, and after his death of their mother, equivalent to 5 per cent on the value of the stock in trade. The bond was in no way secured on the business. The sons further, in consideration of their father entering into the arrangement, discharged all claims competent to them on his death to any share of his estate. W died in 1893.

In an action at the instance of the Inland Revenue to recover duty on the property so acquired by his sons, held (following Crossman v. The Queen, 1886, L. R., 18 Q. B. D. 256) that the transfer of the business was a voluntary settlement within the meaning of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, sec. 38, subsec. 2, and that the annuity was an interest in the business reserved by implication to the settlor, and therefore that duty was payable.

1st Division. In December 1893 the Lord Advocate, on behalf of the Board of Exchequer Inland Revenue, brought an action against John H. Wilson, Louis G. O.
 Cause. Wilson, and Charles A. Wilson, photographers in Aberdeen, concluding
 Ld. Wellwood. for decree against the defenders ordaining them to “deliver to the pursuer a full and true account, verified by oath and duly stamped, of the personal or moveable property of the deceased George Washington Wilson, photographer, Aberdeen, which passed to and was acquired by the defenders under an agreement between him and them, dated 4th May 1887,”* in the following circumstances.

* The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. c. 12), enacts, sec. 38.—“(1) Stamp duties at the like rates as are by this Act charged on affidavits and inventories shall be charged and paid on accounts delivered of the personal or moveable property to be included therein according to the value thereof. (2) The personal or moveable property to be included in an account shall be property of the following descriptions, viz :— . . .

“(c) Any property passing under any past or future voluntary settlement made by any person dying on or after such day” (that is, on or after 1st June 1881) “by deed or any other instrument not taking effect as a will, whereby an interest in such property for life, or any other period determinable by reference to death, is reserved either expressly or by implication to the settlor, or whereby the settlor may have reserved to himself the right, by the exercise of any power, to restore to himself, or to reclaim the absolute interest in such property.”

Sec. 39.—“Every person who, as beneficiary, trustee, or otherwise, acquires possession or assumes the management of any personal or moveable property of a description to be included in an account according to the preceding section shall, upon retaining the same for his own use, or distributing or disposing thereof, and in any case within six calendar months after the death of the deceased, deliver to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue a full and true account, verified by oath, of such property, duly stamped, as required by this Act.”

George Washington Wilson carried on a photographic business in Aberdeen, in partnership with George Brown Smith, under the firm of George Washington Wilson & Company, until 31st March 1887, when the partnership was dissolved, it being agreed that Mr Smith should be paid out.

Lord Advocate
v. Wilson.

Thereafter, on 4th May 1887, Mr Wilson, as party of the first part, entered into an agreement with his said sons, as parties of the second part, whereby it was agreed as follows:—“(First) The second parties hereby agree to enter into a formal contract of copartnery in terms to be approved of by the first party; (second) on said contract being executed, and a bond and bills granted, as hereinafter provided, the whole stock in trade of the said firm of George Washington Wilson & Company, together with the goodwill of the business and the right to use the said company name of George Washington Wilson & Company (but not the book debts of the firm) shall belong to the second parties’ firm as their absolute property, and the first party hereby agrees to grant all deeds necessary for this purpose; (third) in consideration of the second parties’ firm receiving the said stock in trade and goodwill of the business, the second parties, as individuals and as a firm, hereby agree to relieve the first party of the sum payable by him to the said George Brown Smith . . . to the extent of £750, and to grant three bills or promissory-notes accordingly, by themselves as individuals and also as a firm, to the first party; . . . and further, the second parties, as individuals and as a firm, agree to grant a bond of annuity in favour of the first party and his wife Mrs Maria Ann Cassie or Wilson, securing to the first party during his life, and after his death to his said wife during her life, if she shall survive the first party, an annuity equivalent to 5 per centum on the value of the said stock in trade, which has been ascertained by mutual valuation to amount to the sum of £7291, 17s. 6d., after deducting the said sum of £750, . . . from the date when the said stock in trade was handed over to the second parties . . . during the lives of the first party and his said wife, and of the survivor of them; . . . (fourth) the first party shall be entitled to collect for his own use the whole of the debts due to the said firm of George Washington Wilson & Company prior to 31st March 1887; . . . (fifth) the first party hereby agrees to grant, and the second parties, as a firm and as individuals, agree to accept a lease or leases of seven years’ duration,” of certain premises which had been occupied by Mr Wilson at a rent in all of £150; . . . “(seventh) further, it is also hereby agreed as part of the consideration for the first party entering into this agreement, that the second parties shall discharge and renounce, as they respectively do hereby expressly discharge and renounce, all claims which they or any of them have or may have by or through the death of the first party to any part or share of his estate, heritable or moveable, in respect of legitim, bairns’ part of gear, or otherwise.”

On the same date, and in terms of the agreement, the sons executed a bond of annuity and entered into a lease of the business premises. The annuity amounted to £364, 12s., and it was not secured in any way on the business or the property transferred to the sons.

1, enacts,—“Subsec. 2 of sec. 38 of ‘The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881,’ is hereby amended as follows:— . . . The description of property marked (c) shall be construed as if the expression ‘voluntary settlement’ included any trust, whether expressed in writing or otherwise, in favour of a volunteer, and if contained in a deed or other instrument effecting the settlement, whether such deed or other instrument was made for valuable consideration or not as between the settlor and any other person, and as if the expression ‘such property,’ wherever the same occurs, included the proceeds of sale thereof.”

No. 195. Mr Wilson died on 9th March 1893, the annuity having been regularly paid to him.

Lord Advocate
v. Wilson.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The personal property acquired by the defenders from the deceased having passed to them by voluntary settlement within the meaning of the said statutes, they are bound in respect thereof to pay stamp-duty on account.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(3) Said property not having passed to the defenders by voluntary settlement, in terms of said statutes, they are not liable in payment of the duty sued for. (4) The deceased George Washington Wilson, not having retained an interest for life in the property condescended on, nor having reserved power to reclaim the absolute interest in said property, the defenders ought to be assoilzied, with expenses.

A proof was allowed, the import of which sufficiently appears from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood). On 8th June 1894, the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) gave decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

* “OPINION.—(After quoting the sections of the Revenue Acts cited supra)—I have to decide whether the agreement between the late George W. Wilson and his sons, the defenders, which is partially quoted in condescendence 4, was or was not a ‘voluntary settlement’ in the sense of the statutes, and whether by that agreement an interest in the property made over was reserved to him for his life. In considering those questions it must be kept in view that under the statute the reservation may be either express or by implication; and also that an instrument constitutes a ‘voluntary settlement’ whether it is made for valuable consideration or not.

“It will be seen that the net is spread very wide and that the meshes are small.

“My opinion is, that the agreement in question was a voluntary settlement in the sense of the statutes, as distinguished from a transaction or bargain for substantial consideration. It was in substance simply a family arrangement. It does not bear to be a sale; it proceeds on the narrative that the father had arranged to ‘hand over’ the whole of the business to his sons, including the stock in trade and goodwill, but not the book debts of the firm. No cash was paid down, but the second parties undertook to pay out a former partner of their father, George Brown Smith, at the price of £750. On the other hand, they received goods and stock in trade to cover that sum, in addition to the value (£7291, 17s. 6d.) upon which the annuity to be afterwards mentioned was calculated. In return the second parties undertook as individuals, and as a firm, to grant a bond of annuity in favour of their father and mother and longest liver of them, equivalent to 5 per cent on the value of the stock in trade (£7291, 17s. 6d.), after deducting the said sum of £750. Lastly, in respect of the provisions in this deed, the second parties renounced all claims which they had or might have through the death of their father, to any part of his estate, heritable or moveable.

“It seems to me that this is simply a voluntary settlement, under which the settler reserved to himself for his life an interest in the property settled. It is true that the interest was not secured upon the property itself. But this, I think, is not material, because the statute says the reservation either may be express or by implication. The interest reserved was simply the interest on the value of the whole concern handed over; and it was secured by a bond which bound not merely the sons as individuals, but also the firm. The intention and understanding of parties is made clear by this, that when the business was converted into a limited company, shares and cash to the value of £7296 were allotted to G. W. Wilson, as nominee of his three sons, manifestly for the purpose of securing the annuity in question.

“It is said by the defenders that they gave an adequate value for the business, because they came under an obligation to pay an annuity, the capitalised value of which was £4331, 3s. 6d. But when we turn to the statement of the profits made by the second parties for the six years following the agreement, we find that they amounted on an average to about £2000 a-year. It is true that for a year or two immediately preceding the agreement the works had not been carried on to a profit; but there must have been some exceptional cause for this, which disappeared whenever the sons took up the business, because in the very first year the profits rose to £1605.

"There are two decisions which have a close application to the present case, viz.:—The Lord Advocate v. M'Kersie, 19 S. L. R. 438, and Crossman v. The Queen, L. R., 18 Q. B. D., 256.

"The case of The Lord Advocate v. M'Kersie was a decision under section 7 of the Succession-Duty Act of 1853, but the question was practically the same. There a father assigned and made over to his sons his interest in a business, the value being declared to be £28,750, as a payment to account of the share of residue of his estate provided for them in his settlement. In return the sons agreed to make payment to their father during his lifetime of an annuity of £1150, and the following observations of Lord Fraser shew the nature of the question and the views which he took of it (p. 440),—'On the death of William M'Kersie, the father, the defenders undoubtedly obtained an increase of beneficial interest, in respect that their obligation to pay the annuity of £1150 then ceased. But this is not enough in all cases to entitle the Crown to judgment. There is one exception expressly specified in the Act, within which the defenders contend their case comes. If the transaction be a bona fide sale, then no duty is exigible, and there may be such a bona fide sale although the money may not be payable until the death of a certain person, as was decided by the Master of the Rolls in the case of Fryer v. Morland, 3d August 1876, L.R., 3 Chanc. Div. 675. Now, was this a bona fide sale? Or was it, as the Lord Ordinary holds it to have been, simply a gratuitous transference by the father to his two sons, reserving to himself the interest of the value of the property which he conveyed? No doubt the transference was irrevocable, but still the transaction was one whereby the transferer reserved to himself, not in express words, the liferent of the estate, but he did so in effect. Dealing with this 7th section the Master of the Rolls in the above case of Fryer says of it,—'The object is plain enough; it was to prevent a man conveying the fee reserving to himself a life interest.' Now this is as effectually done in the mode astutely adopted in the present case, by taking a bond from the transferees for the interest, at the rate of 4 per cent on the money value of the property conveyed. The defenders paid down nothing in the shape of money or money's worth, and therefore there is absent in this case the first characteristic of a sale, viz., a price paid out of the pockets of the purchasers.'

"On the facts, I do not think that that case can be distinguished from the present.

"The case of Crossman v. The Queen was a case in the Queen's Bench Division under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881. The circumstances were practically the same. The father, Robert Crossman, made over to two of his sons his interest in a partnership business, the sons in return covenanting to secure to their father during his life interest at the rate of 4 per cent on the value of the shares appointed and assigned to them respectively, and also, in the event of his death, to secure annuities to his widow and another son, the latter annuities to be paid out of the profits. As I have said, this was a suit brought in 1886 under the Act of 1881, and before the passing of the amending Act of 1889 quoted in record. It was strongly urged for the suppliants that the transaction was one for a valuable consideration and not a voluntary settlement, in respect that the covenants to pay interest at 4 per cent during the life of Robert Crossman were not dependent upon the future prosperity of the business, and were a good consideration for the transference of the business.

"Even without the aid of the amending Act, the Court held that this plea consideration did not require to be adequate if the divestiture was complete.¹ This was the case here, for the transfer of the business was absolute. Nothing was left to the father but the personal obligations of the sons and their firm. The sons were quite unfettered, and might have disposed of the business as they liked. The case of the *Lord Advocate v. M'Kersies*² had no bearing, for it was on the construction of a different Act of Parliament.

Argued for the pursuer;—The transfer of the business and the payment of the annuity to the father were evidently just a family arrangement. They were not a commercial transaction like a sale. The case of *Crossman*³ exactly applied, and ought to be followed. M'Court's case¹ did not apply, for the Court were satisfied there that there had been an out-and-out gift of the estate.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—My opinion is in accordance with that of the Lord Ordinary.

The expression “voluntary settlement” is not one with which Scottish lawyers are familiar, and, on this account, I am disposed to attach an especial weight to the English decision in Crossman v. The Queen, where the facts were very similar to those now before us.

This is a handing over by a father to his sons of his whole business, and, in respect of what the sons get, they renounce all claims of succession to their father's estate. The father gives a very advantageous lease of the building in was ill-founded. Justice Hawkins, in reading the judgment of the Court, said (p. 265),—‘It is said, however, that the absolute covenant to pay to Robert Crossman during his life 4 per cent interest on the value of the shares, regardless of whether the profits of those shares amounted to that sum or not, was in itself a sufficient consideration. We do not so regard it. We look upon that covenant in substance, though possibly not in form, as a mere mode of reserving to Robert Crossman a life interest in the shares transferred to the extent of £4 per cent on their value, a sum in all probability far less than the actual annual nett profit they were yielding. In substance, it was a gift of whatever annual profit (if any) beyond the £4 per cent the shares might yield during his life, and an absolute gift of them on his death, subject only to the said annuities.’

“The Judges in that case quoted with approval Lord Fraser's remarks, which I have already quoted.

“In both these cases, it will be observed the annuity was not secured on the property, but, as here, rested on the personal obligation of the transferees.

“Of course if the owner of property makes an absolute disposition inter vivos for a price down, however small, putting the funds entirely beyond his control and reserving no life interest in them directly or by implication, they will on his death be free from any claim at the instance of the Crown. The latest case on the point is Lord Advocate v. M'Court, 20 R. 488, in which, although the First Division of the Court took a different view from myself in regard to the bona fides of the transaction, no doubt was expressed by the Inner-House or myself of what was the legal effect of a bona fide absolute transference and divestiture inter vivos.

“But under the statutes with which I am at present dealing it is sufficient to subject the parties taking under such a settlement to account duty that it's proved that the agreement was voluntary and that the settler reserved to himself in the way which I have explained an interest for life in the property made over.”

Lord Advocate
v. Wilson.

On the face of the agreement this is not a commercial transaction. It cannot be imagined that if the father had been approached by a third party and offered this annuity he would have entered into such an agreement. The facts proved in evidence bear out the impression produced by the deed itself, that it was executed because the father was minded to bestow his business on his sons, contenting himself with some small annual return proportionate to the value of the stock in trade. This was therefore a settlement on his sons of this part of his estate, and it proceeded from his good will. I consider that it is a voluntary settlement in the sense of the Act.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the words in the section "expressly or by implication" entitle us to hold that this annuity was in the sense of the statute "reserved." It is a pretty direct implication by which we conclude that the annuity of 5 per cent on the stock in trade was really reserved out of the business handed over. On this matter the case of Crossman is in point, for there the annuity was not expressly payable out of what was conveyed. The case of M'Kersie has a less direct bearing, for it is a decision on a different statute, and the section there founded on did not require that the consideration should be reserved,—the words being "reservation or assurance of or contract for any benefit."

LORD ADAM.—There appear to be two questions in this case.

1st, Whether the agreement of 4th May 1887, whereby the defenders acquired right to the whole stock in trade of the firm of George Washington Wilson & Company, together with the goodwill of the business, was a voluntary settlement in the sense of the 38th section of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881?

2d, Whether, if so, the settler, George Washington Wilson, thereby reserved an interest in such for life, either expressly or by implication?

I concur with the Lord Ordinary that the agreement in question amounts in substance to a family arrangement. It is not alleged, and is not the fact, that any money was paid by the defenders for the property to which they thereby acquired right.

It is true that they thereby agreed to relieve their father of a sum of £750 due by him to George Brown Smith, a former partner, but value in the shape of goods was put into their hands by their father to enable them to meet this obligation.

Further, it appears that the defenders by the agreement bound themselves to grant a bond of annuity in favour of their father and his wife, securing to him, and after his death to her, an annuity at the rate of 5 per cent per annum on the value of the stock handed over to the defenders, and the defenders did, of the same date, grant a bond of annuity, in terms of this obligation.

It will be observed that this annuity is not in any way secured over the property specified in the agreement, and if the question had been open, it might very well have been doubted whether the settler had thereby reserved an interest in such property for life, seeing that the property had passed out of his hands, and might have been dissipated next day.

But I think the question was in terms decided in the Queen's Bench in Eng-

Reparation—Ship—Danger to ship at quay—Obstruction by vessel lying outside and parallel—Right to cut mooring ropes of outside vessel to escape danger.—While the s.s. "Dunlossit" was lying at a quay the s.s. "Easdale" came in, in the evening, took up her position outside and close to the "Dunlossit," and moored herself to the shore by ropes crossing the stem and stern of the "Dunlossit." A gale rose during the night, and the position of both vessels became perilous. During the night the master of the "Dunlossit" repeatedly asked the master of the "Easdale" to move, so that the "Dunlossit" might escape, but the master of the "Easdale" did not do so. In the morning the master of the "Dunlossit," after giving warning of his intention, cut the mooring ropes of the "Easdale" and steamed away. The "Easdale" was then driven ashore by the wind and damaged. In an action of damages at the instance of the owner of the "Easdale" against the owners of the "Dunlossit," held that the cutting of the ropes was prima facie an illegal act, and that the defenders had failed to justify it, and were therefore liable in damages for the consequences of the act.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN December 1893 John Currie, owner of the s.s. "Easdale," raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Francis M. Allan and Neil Campbell, owners of the s.s. "Dunlossit," concluding for payment of £450 for damage alleged to have been done to the "Easdale" by the crew of the "Dunlossit" cutting her adrift from her moorings at Port Askaig in the Isle of Islay.

The following narrative of the circumstances under which the "Easdale" was damaged is taken from the findings in the final interlocutor of the First Division of the Court:—On the afternoon of 17th November 1893, while the s.s. "Dunlossit" lay moored to the quay at Port Askaig in the Isle of Islay the s.s. "Easdale" came to Port Askaig and was moored to the quay alongside but outside of the "Dunlossit," by ropes passed across the "Dunlossit." Before six p.m., and while the two steamers thus lay, a gale of exceptional violence came on, which lasted all night and until after the unmooring after mentioned. Throughout the night the "Dunlossit" suffered considerable damage through the tossing against her of the "Easdale" and of another vessel lying on her inner side. The master of the "Dunlossit," from and after six p.m. on the 17th November, desired to leave, but it was impossible for him to do so unless the "Easdale" cleared out. The master of the "Dunlossit" repeatedly asked the master of the "Easdale" to clear out. It was impossible for the master of the "Easdale" to move his steamer so as to enable the "Dunlossit" to leave without the "Easdale" herself going to sea. It was impossible for the "Easdale" to go to sea, with safety to life and property on board, owing to two of the crew having refused to go out on account of the gale, and the remaining crew not being sufficient to man the ship in the existing state of the sea and weather. The master of the "Easdale" declined to go out. During the night and morning the master of the "Dunlossit" repeatedly threatened to the master of the "Easdale" to cut the moorings of that vessel. Shortly after eight A.M. on 18th November the master of the "Dunlossit" cut the moorings of the "Easdale," the men on board hastily left, and the "Easdale" drifted to sea with no one on board, and was driven on shore and suffered damage. At the time when the moorings were cut the "Dunlossit" was suffering damage from the contact of the "Easdale," and was in serious peril of further damage owing to contact with the "Easdale" and the steamer on her inner side, and also to the possibility of another vessel (the "Macbeth") moored in front of her coming into collision with her. The master of the "Dunlossit" in cutting the moorings of the "Easdale" acted without any consent or authority from anyone representing the "Easdale," and in the knowledge that by cutting her moorings he exposed her to the certainty of her being driven out to sea and to the probability of serious damage. The master of the "Dunlossit" so acted solely for the protection of the "Dunlossit" against present and possible damage.

Allan.

The pursuer averred that the crew of the "Dunlossit" "wrongfully and unnecessarily cut the 'Easdale' adrift from her moorings."

The pursuer pleaded;—The s.s. "Easdale" having sustained the loss and damage before condescended on, and such loss and damage having been caused wrongfully and unnecessarily by those on board the s.s. "Dunlossit," for whom the defenders are responsible, the pursuer is entitled to decree as craved, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The pursuer's master and crew having abandoned their vessel, which became a source of danger, and having regard to the state of the weather, the position of the various vessels, and the whole circumstances, the defenders' master was justified in cutting the "Easdale" adrift. (3) Any damage occasioned to pursuer's vessel not being owing to fault on the part of defenders or their servants, they are not liable, and should be assoilzied, with costs. (4) Pursuer in any case having contributed by his servants' negligence to the damage is barred from suing.

A proof was led, in which the facts above narrated were proved.

On 6th April 1894, the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) pronounced this interlocutor (after findings in fact similar to those above quoted):—"Finds that immediately before the departure of the 'Dunlossit' the master of the 'Macbeth' found that the north end of the quay was giving way and damaging his moorings, and he called this out to the master of the 'Dunlossit'; finds that shortly after the departure of the 'Dunlossit' the north end of the quay gave way to such an extent that the 'Macbeth's' moorings were destroyed, and by skilful manœuvring she was swung down on the outside of the 'Islesman'; finds that if the 'Dunlossit' had not left the quay at the time she did, and if the three vessels which had been lying abreast of one another had remained at the quay for about half-an-hour, the 'Macbeth' would have come down on the top of them, and probably the whole four vessels would have been wrecked; finds under the circumstances that the master of the 'Dunlossit' was justified in cutting the ropes of the 'Easdale' so as to admit of his leaving the quay, and that the defenders are not responsible for the consequences to the 'Easdale'; therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns."

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The "Dunlossit" was not entitled to cut the "Easdale's" moorings in view of the certain danger to the latter vessel. Nothing but absolute necessity would justify such a course, and the facts as proved did not disclose any such case. The ships had all weathered the worst part of the gale, and there was no necessity to cut the moorings in the morning. There was no abandonment by the crew of the "Easdale"; all they refused to do was to put their lives in danger by going to sea in such a gale. The onus of justifying their high-handed act lay on the defenders. This they had failed to do, and as they had used the pursuer's property to save themselves, they ought to pay the damage done in doing so.¹

Argued for the defenders;—The "Easdale" had voluntarily put herself in such a position as to be a source of danger to the defenders' vessel, and that being so she was under an obligation to move if the "Dunlossit's" requirements made it necessary. The dangers incurred by the "Dunlossit" were obvious, and so serious as to justify her master in sacrificing the "Easdale."²

LORD PRESIDENT.—The leading facts in this case are singular and striking. During the night of the 17th and morning of the 18th November last, two steamers lay moored to the quay at Port Askaig in Islay. The weather was most tempestuous all night and morning. The one steamer, all through the night, was anxious to go out to sea, but could not do so unless the other, which was moored outside her, consented to go out also. This the outside vessel could not, or at least did not, do. At eight o'clock on the morning of the 18th the master of the steamer desiring to go out, the "Dunlossit," solved the problem by cutting the moorings of the other steamer, the "Easdale," and sending her adrift. He thus freed his own vessel and got away. The owners of the "Easdale" now sue for damages, the "Easdale" having when cut adrift gone ashore and suffered injury.

I think it sufficiently clear that prima facie the act of the master of the "Dunlossit," in cutting the moorings of the "Easdale" and sending her adrift, was an illegal act; and that it is therefore for the defenders to justify that act on some ground known to law. I shall state briefly what I take to be the facts.

Port Askaig has no harbour, and vessels lying there are moored to the pier or wharf, there being no pier projecting into the sea. On the afternoon of the 17th the "Dunlossit" was lying moored when the "Easdale" arrived, and the "Easdale" accordingly lay outside the "Dunlossit," and was moored to the quay by ropes, which passed over the "Dunlossit." The "Dunlossit" explained to the "Easdale," at the outset, that she intended soon to leave, and the "Easdale" had no intention herself of making any stay. By six o'clock, however, the storm had come on, and the "Easdale's" business at Port Askaig was only then finished. From that time onwards the storm raged with great violence, and two of the "Easdale's" hands declined to go to sea on account of the severity of the weather. Whether, if she had been fully manned, she could safely have gone out to sea may be doubtful, but it is certain that, with two of her crew away, it would have been impossible to face the storm. The "Easdale" accordingly stayed where she was. Meanwhile the "Dunlossit" was impatient to get away. She was lying between two steamers, the "Easdale," as already explained, being outside her. As the night went on she was suffering damage from the other steamers tossing against her and tearing the belting off her side ; No. 196. and I think that, towards morning, her position became one of considerable July 17, 1894. peril, having regard not merely to the contact with the steamers on either side, Currie v. but also to the proximity of a fourth steamer moored in front of her. Suffering Allan. damage from hour to hour, and apprehensive of dangers which might involve the destruction of his steamer, the master, by eight in the morning, had resolved that his position was no longer tolerable. He had repeatedly appealed to the "Easdale" to let her out, but it was manifest that the "Easdale" could not move without having to go to sea, and could not go to sea without her crew. Accordingly the master of the "Easdale" refused to move. The master of the "Dunlossit" threatened several times to cut the moorings of the "Easdale" before he actually did so. About eight he proceeded to do so, and the men on the "Easdale" had just time to clear out before the steamer was sent adrift.

Now, I am prepared to hold that the "Dunlossit" was suffering substantial damage and was in serious peril ; that she could only avoid damage and peril by going out ; and that as the "Easdale" declined to move, the cutting of that steamer's mooring was the only way of enabling the "Dunlossit" to escape damage and peril. On the other hand, it is equally certain that to cut the "Easdale" adrift was to expose her to at least equal damage and peril ; and it is not disputed that, when the master of the "Dunlossit" sent the "Easdale" out into the storm, he did it with his eyes open to what it meant to that vessel.

In using the word "peril," it is necessary to remember that there is on neither side any question of peril to life. It was, so far as the "Dunlossit" was concerned, merely present and probable injury to the ship to a greater or less (and an entirely uncertain) extent, that is put forward as the justification of the act in question. On the other hand, as already pointed out, the men on the "Easdale" had time to clear out before she was sent adrift.

Now, I own to having a strong repugnance to the idea that one man is entitled, at his own hand, to send his neighbour's ship it may be to perdition, in order to save his own ship, and then to refuse to bear the loss. I have stated, I hope fairly, what I consider to have been the serious risks to which the "Dunlossit" was exposed. But, after all, the ultimate consequences were calculable in money ; and if anyone was liable for such damage as the "Dunlossit" might sustain, that damage could be made good to her owners. I am not satisfied of the soundness of the reasoning by which the defenders maintain that the owners of the "Easdale" were guilty of a breach of duty to the "Dunlossit" in that the "Easdale" did not go out to sea and thus release the "Dunlossit." But, even assuming the "Easdale" to have been in the wrong, it does not follow that the "Dunlossit" had the right to wreck her, and the defenders have failed to place their right to do so at the cost of the pursuer upon any satisfactory legal ground. Even assuming fault on the part of the outside vessel, and serious danger to the inside vessel, it is difficult to ascertain whether it is under all conditions, and, if not, then under what conditions, that the right to destroy the outside vessel arises to the inside vessel for her own safety. I have heard no theory which would give this right to a vessel of similar value to the vessel to be wrecked, and at the same time withhold from a vessel worth £1000 the right to sacrifice to her own safety a vessel worth £100,000. Such heroic measures as that adopted by the master of the "Dunlossit" do not readily fit in with the methods of protecting property, and redressing injury to property, which pass current in peaceful communities. It is perhaps on the whole better that the master of a vessel in danger from another should protest against such conduct as he considers injurious and hold the offender liable in the consequences, which the sequel will frequently shew to be less overwhelming than had been apprehended.

Let it be remembered, however, that the question we have got to settle is not whether the master of the "Dunlossit" can be justified in foro poli for laying violent hands on his neighbour's goods. The question is, who is to bear the loss? Now, I cannot help thinking that the frankness of the defenders' claim is apt to make one forget its exceeding arrogance. They assert right, for their own benefit, to seize and destroy another man's ship, and to make him pay for the consequences. This new form of compulsory taking would have for its characteristics that it is unauthorised by anything but the needs of the taker, that it serves none but his private benefit, and that it is unrestrained by any obligation to compensate. I own my inability to fall in with such views.

A subordinate argument was submitted that there was no damage inasmuch as the "Easdale" would have been destroyed had she been left where she was, at the pier. This theory is highly conjectural, and, in my opinion, the evidence does not establish it.

I am for recalling the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD M'LAREN.—The facts in this case are not seriously in dispute. I accept entirely the narrative given by your Lordship, and agree in the conclusion drawn from the facts. On the evidence, and as a matter of general knowledge, I assume that when the "Easdale" moored herself as she did she was exercising the ordinary right of a vessel touching at a wharf of the description of Port Askaig. It is equally clear that she was under an obligation to remove from the position which she had taken up when required to do so by the "Dunlossit," in order to allow that vessel to proceed on her voyage. It appears to me, however, that this obligation must always and of necessity be qualified by the condition that a vessel in the position of the "Easdale" is only bound to remove as and when it is consistent with her own safety. In a crowded harbour it may be physically impossible for a ship moored as the "Easdale" was to remove at any given time so as to allow another vessel to proceed. It appears to me that in the case of a wharf open to the sea, if the master when required to move cannot do so without imperilling the ship and the lives of the crew, that is equivalent to physical impossibility. The ordinary case of obligation to remove is certainly not an obligation to leave the ship and then to cut her moorings and allow her to drift on to a lee shore; it is an obligation, if possible, to give the other vessel a passage, having regard to the relative positions of the ships and the dangers of navigation.

On the evening before this accident occurred it was the intention of both the vessels to proceed on their voyage that evening, but it is perfectly clear that the state of the weather was such as to make it unsafe for either to go to sea, and there can be no doubt that at that time the master of the "Easdale" was justified in refusing to leave his moorings; indeed, his view was acquiesced in by the master of the "Dunlossit." But in the course of that evening a fresh element was introduced, for the master of the "Easdale," in his anxiety to get to a safe harbour, endeavoured to persuade his crew to try to take the vessel across the sound. They, however, refused, and the mate absconded. Next morning when the "Dunlossit" again wished to proceed, though there is doubt whether the "Easdale" could have sailed in safety (the balance of the evidence seems to me adverse to the view), I assume that she could have sailed if her crew had been ready. The crew had, however, not turned up, and it was clearly impossible for the master to proceed with a deficient crew. I am far from saying that a master who refuses to proceed on the ground that his crew has left the ship may remain where he is without incurring liability for damages of the nature of demurrage, but if he is prevented from leaving by the state of the weather, then he is excused absolutely. But admitting that the "Easdale," was in fault in not having a sufficient crew, we have to consider the very different question whether the "Dunlossit" was entitled to take the conduct of the "Easdale" into her own hands and to cut her adrift. I cannot assent to the proposition that even if there had been absolutely no crew and no master on board the "Easdale," the "Dunlossit" would have been entitled to take such a step. In such a case the master of the "Dunlossit" might, if the weather permitted, remove the "Easdale" sufficiently to permit him to get out, and then bring her back to the wharf, but the right which is here asserted is that when the "Easdale" was unable to move without incurring great danger, the "Dunlossit" was entitled to cut her moorings and make her a derelict. That is what, in fact, was done. Now, I asked during the argument whether the authority of any jurist or moralist could be cited in support of such a proposition, that you may lawfully destroy your neighbour's property in order to make the better use of your own. I can see that very alarming consequences might result from the recognition of such a principle, and I am not willing to give effect to it. The case is indeed a very unfavourable one for giving effect to the right claimed, as it is clear that if the "Dunlossit" had waited a few hours until the gale had subsided, both vessels might have moved with safety.

LORD KINNEAR was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor—(after finding the facts as above narrated):—"Find in law that in so cutting the moorings of the 'Easdale' the master of the 'Dunlossit' made the defenders liable for the damages resulting to the 'Easdale': Find the defenders liable in expenses in both Courts: On the motion of both parties, remit to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire to ascertain the amount of damage, and to proceed in the cause as shall be just; and authorise him to decern for the taxed amount of the expenses for which the defenders are hereby found liable."

July 17, 1894. Tinnevelly Sugar Refining Co., Limited, v. Mirrlees, Watson, & Yaryan Co., Limited. Held that the company had not set forth a title to sue, as D could not have acted as its agent before it was in existence.

1st Division. By contract, constituted by a tender and relative acceptance, dated respectively 26th November 1889 and 11th July 1890, the Mirrlees, Watson, & Yaryan Company, Glasgow, agreed to supply Messrs Darley & Butler, Billiter Square, London, with certain machinery and iron-work for a building for a refinery in Tuticorin. Delivery was to be given free alongside vessel in Glasgow Harbour.

The Tinnevelly Sugar Refining Company, Limited, registered on 29th July 1890, on 24th January 1894, with consent and concurrence of Messrs Darley & Butler, and Messrs Darley & Butler for all right and interest they might have in the premises, raised an action of damages against the Mirrlees, Watson, & Yaryan Company, on the ground that the machinery supplied by them was defective, and had caused loss to the company.

The pursuers averred;—" . . . The said machinery and iron-work, though ordered by the pursuers Darley & Butler, were intended for the Tinnevelly Sugar Refining Company, which was then in course of formation, and this was made known to the defenders before the contract was entered into. . . . Messrs Darley & Butler, who have all through the negotiations transacted for the Tinnevelly Sugar Refining Company with the defenders, are large shareholders in the pursuers' company. The contracts for the machinery were made by them for behoof and on behalf of the pursuers the Tinnevelly Sugar Refining Company. The defenders knew before the contract was given to them for the machinery that it was for the pursuers' company's use, and that Messrs Darley & Butler were acting in making the said contract for behoof of or as agents for the pursuers' company. Messrs Darley & Butler have, from the beginning of negotiations with the defenders, acted for behoof of the Tinnevelly Sugar Refining Company, and the defenders have treated and transacted with Messrs Darley & Butler on that footing. The machinery was paid for out of the capital of the Tinnevelly Sugar Refining Company. . . . The said machinery and iron-work was manufactured by the defenders, and early in 1891 was erected at works at Tuticorin, which had been specially constructed for its reception on plans approved of by the defenders. The work of erection was effected under the superintendence of an engineer sent out by the defenders. The defenders knew that Messrs Darley & Butler and the pursuers, in giving them the order for the making and erection of the machinery, relied on the defenders' practical knowledge to provide the pursuers with machinery capable of performing the work required of it. . . . Work was begun at the refinery at Tuticorin in September 1891. The manager, Mr Thomas Arthur, was a well-qualified sugar refiner, selected and approved by the defenders on behalf of the pursuers. . . . After the refinery was started, the defenders were always fully informed of how it was working, and continually assured the pursuers that the machinery was quite adequate, and would, when everything was in full working order, produce what was stipulated for. . . ."

The pursuers further averred that the machinery had proved incapable of performing the work which under the contract it was to be made to do, and that the Tinnevelly Company had in consequence suffered damage to the extent of £23,000, of which they gave the details. They made no averment of any damage having been suffered by Messrs Darley & Butler.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuers having suffered damage to the amount sued for in consequence of the defenders' said breach of contract, decree should be granted as craved. (3) The defenders having negotiated and contracted on the footing that Messrs Darley & Butler were acting for behoof of or as agents for the Tinnevely Sugar Refining Company, are barred from questioning the pursuers' title. (4) The defenders, having admitted by their actions, as condescended on, their obligation to make the machinery perform the work required of it by the pursuers, are barred from pleading want of title in the pursuers, or failure of the pursuers to make timeous rejection.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The pursuers' statements are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons.

On 7th June 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Low) allowed a proof.*

* "OPINION.—The defenders maintain that their first plea in law of no title to sue should be sustained, and the action thrown out without any inquiry. They argued that the contract, for breach of which damages are sought, being made by Messrs Darley & Butler before the Tinnevely Sugar Refining Company was incorporated, that company cannot sue upon the contract, even although it was made for behoof of the company when it should come into existence, and that the concurrence of Darley & Butler cannot aid the company, because that firm, not having sustained the loss for which reparation is sought, have no interest and could not themselves have sued the action.

"It seems to be clear that a company incorporated under the Companies Acts is not bound by a contract made for it or on its behalf before incorporation, unless, after incorporation, it has so acted as to make the contract its own. Further, it appears to be settled in England that a company, after incorporation, cannot ratify a contract entered into on its behalf before incorporation, because ratification (in the strict sense) refers to an act previously done for the person ratifying, and cannot apply to an act done before that person came into existence.

"The case chiefly relied upon by the defenders was the Northumberland Avenue Hotel Company, 33 Ch. Div. 16. In that case the plaintiff sued the liquidator of the hotel company for damages for breach of a contract entered into between him and one acting as trustee for the intended company before its incorporation. The plaintiff had a lease from the Board of Works of certain lands, upon condition that he should erect certain buildings within a specified time. The contract with the trustee for the intended company was for a sub-lease of the lands at a higher rent than that which the plaintiff was under obligation to pay to the Board of Works—the company being bound to erect the buildings stipulated for in the plaintiff's lease. The articles of association of the company provided that the contract should be adopted and carried into effect. After being registered the company entered into possession of the lands, spent large sums of money upon them, made payments to the plaintiff to account of rent, and passed certain resolutions, with the assent of the plaintiff, modifying the contract which had been made with him. The company went into liquidation, and the Board of Works cancelled the lease to the plaintiff, and resumed possession of the lands, apparently because the company had not erected the buildings stipulated for within the specified time.

"The Court of Appeal held that the plaintiff had no claim for damages (1) because the contract, being made before the company was in existence, was not binding upon it, and was incapable of ratification by the company after incorporation; and (2) because the acts of the company were not evidence of a fresh agreement having been entered into between it and the plaintiff, having been done under the erroneous belief that the contract was binding on the company.

"That judgment goes very far, because it was clear that the company had, as far as it possibly could, recognised and taken advantage of the contract. The ground of judgment was that, to give the plaintiff a claim against the company,

No. 197. The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—There was no averment of any contract between the Tinnevely Company and the defenders, even taking the Lord Ordinary's reading of the record. The defenders' contract was on the pursuers' own statement, with Darley & Butler, and the latter could not at its date act as agents for the Tinnevely Company, as averred by the pursuers, for that company was admittedly not then in existence. For the same reason there could not be ratification of the contract by the Tinnevely Company.¹ According to its terms the contract was executed by delivery of the iron in Glasgow Harbour, before, therefore, the occurrence in Tuticorin of the incidents on which the Tinnevely Company relied to bring them into direct relation with the defenders. Besides, the contract was not assignable. There were no averments to the effect that a new agreement was made by the Tinnevely Company. The presence it was necessary that the latter should have made a new contract with him upon the same terms as the original contract, and that the facts shewed that they had not done so, but had proceeded upon the erroneous belief that the original contract was binding upon the company. The footing, therefore, on which the company took possession of the lands, and otherwise recognised the contract, was essential to the judgment. If it had been proved that the directors knew that the original agreement was not binding on the company, it may well be that the judgment would have been different, and that the Court would, in that case, have held that the actings of the company were evidence of an agreement between them and the plaintiff.

"The decision, therefore, apart from the peculiar circumstances of the case, does not appear to me to go further than to affirm that an action will not lie against a company unless it is rested upon a contract with the company itself. But I know of no authority for saying that such a contract must be a formal contract. I apprehend that it is sufficient if the actings of parties necessarily lead to the inference that they intended to be, and held themselves out as being, bound to each other. If a company by its acts adopts a contract made before its incorporation, takes benefit by the contract, and allows the other contracting party to act upon the footing that the company is bound to him in the terms of the original agreement, I can see no principle upon which the company should not be bound, just as an individual is bound who homologates an informal or defective contract. And there are many authorities in the English law pointing in that direction, among which I refer to Touche v. The Metropolitan Railway Warehouse Company, L. R., 6 Ch., p. 671; Spiller v. Paris Skating Rink Company, 7 Chanc. Div. p. 368; and Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Company, 38 Chanc. Div. p. 156.

"In this case the averments are that the defenders were from the first told that the machinery which was ordered from them was for the company; that before the machinery was made the company was incorporated; that the machinery, when finished, was sent by the defenders to Tuticorin, where the company had constructed buildings for it on plans approved by the defenders; that the machinery was fitted up by an engineer sent out by the defenders; that the manager who was to work the machinery for the company was selected by the defenders, and that the price was paid out of the capital of the company. According to these averments, the defenders were brought directly into contact with the company as the principals in the transaction. If this had been an action by the defenders for payment of the price upon such averments of adoption of the contract by the company, I think that there would have been a relevant case to go to proof; and, in like manner, when the action is by the company for damages on the ground that the machinery is not fit for the purpose for which it was supplied, I am of opinion that there must be inquiry, so that the precise facts may be ascertained.

of Darley & Butler in the action made no difference. Their concurrence No. 197. in the instance did not make good the otherwise defective title of the Tinnevelly Company, and they made no allegation whatever of damage suffered by themselves.¹ The Tinnevelly Company, therefore, not having been privy to the original contract, and not having set forth facts and circumstances instructing a direct contractual relationship with the defenders, had no title to sue.²

Argued for the pursuers;—There should be a proof before answer, for it was sufficiently averred that the Tinnevelly Company had taken over the original agreement, and that the defenders had accepted them as the contracting parties. Such cases as *In re Northumberland Avenue Hotel Company*³ were distinguishable. There was there no sufficient evidence from which the Court could infer that a new contract had been entered into. It must be admitted that Darley & Butler could not have acted as agents for a non-existent company; but then the actings of the Tinnevelly Company after its incorporation, and of the defenders, inferred novation of the contract by way of adoption.⁴ The contract was assignable, for there was no delectus personarum.⁵ If two parties for valuable consideration enter into a contract, one of the stipulations of which is for the benefit of a stranger to the contract, it is not competent for either party afterwards to object to implement that stipulation.⁶ Title to sue depended upon interest,⁷ and the Tinnevelly Company, which had paid for the machinery, had a clear interest.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The contract, for breach of which this action was brought, was constituted by a tender and relative acceptance, dated respectively 26th November 1889 and 11th July 1890. The contract was for the supply of certain machinery and iron-work for a refinery. On the face of the documents the parties to the contract were the defenders on the one hand, and Messrs Darley & Butler, of Billiter Square Buildings, London, on the other hand.

The pursuers of this action are the Tinnevelly Sugar Refining Company, Limited, with consent and concurrence of Messrs Darley & Butler, and the said Messrs Darley & Butler for all right and interest they may have in the premises. The fact that Messrs Darley & Butler thus appear, not merely as consenting to the instance of the company, but as themselves pursuers, has no practical importance; for in this action of damages no averment is made that that firm has suffered damage. The action is therefore the action of the Tinnevelly Company, Limited.

Now, against this action the defenders' first plea is, "No title to sue." As argued to us, this plea means not merely that the pursuers do not possess, but that they have not set forth, any title to sue. The Lord Ordinary has, before answer, allowed a proof, but the defenders have asked our judgment on the question whether anything is averred and offered to be proved which would make out the pursuers' title.

The company was registered on 29th July 1890, and accordingly was not in existence at the date of the contract. It is therefore legally impossible that the contract can bind the company, unless the company, since its registration, has in some way acquired the rights and submitted itself to the obligations of the contract. Accordingly, the defenders are in the right when they say that the question is, Do the pursuers set forth, on this record, anything done by the company itself which has this result? I have carefully examined the condescendence, and must answer this question in the negative.

The contract, be it observed, was for certain machinery and iron-work, which was to be delivered free alongside vessel in Glasgow Harbour. Now, the pursuers endeavour to bring the company and the defenders into direct relations, by saying that the machinery was erected at Tuticorin, which is in India, under the superintendence of an engineer sent-out by the defenders. But it was admitted in argument (and is indeed manifest) that the erection of the machinery in India was outside the contract which is now sued on. It is unnecessary to criticise in detail the other averments, compendiously stated by the Lord Ordinary, for not one of them, nor all taken together, tend to shew that, after the registration of the company, any contract relation was constituted between it and the defenders.

The absence of such averments is, in truth, accounted for by the fact that the theory of the pursuers' case is entirely different. They begin by saying that when Darley & Butler contracted with the defenders they were acting, and were known by the defenders to be acting, as agents for the Tinnevely Company. This is the basis of the pursuers' case. It is in law an untenable position, for Darley & Butler could not be the agents of a non-existent company. I should infer from the record that the persons acting for the company had not realised this. Accordingly, it is quite consistent with the record to suppose that the persons acting for the company were unaware that if the company was to take the place of Darley & Butler it required,—that is to say, the shareholders or their executive required,—consciously to do so. In place of any such overt action on the part of the company things were allowed to rest on the original contract between Darley & Butler and the defenders, which was erroneously believed to bind the company. I do not pronounce this to have been the true state of the facts, having no occasion to do so; all I say is that the pursuers' record says nothing to the contrary, and much to this effect.

Well, now, the law applicable to such a case seems to be tolerably clear. First of all, where there is no principal there can be no agent, there having been no Tinnevely Company at the date of this contract, Darley & Butler were not agents of that company in entering into the contract. The next point is that, in order to bind the company to a contract not incumbent on it, it is necessary that the company should voluntarily so contract; and it is not equivalent to this if the company merely acts as if, contrary to the fact, the contract had from the beginning been obligatory on it.

I have considered, up to this point, solely the position of the company, and have not taken into account the question how far the consent of the defenders would have been necessary to the substitution of the company for Darley & Butler as parties to the contract. I do not find it necessary to enter upon this question, inasmuch as, in my opinion, the case of the pursuers is irrelevant, No. 197. even if regard be had to the consent of the company alone.

I am for finding that the pursuers have not set forth on record any title in the Tinnevely Sugar Refining Company, Limited, to sue; that there are no relevant averments to support the conclusions in so far as insisted in by Darley & Butler; and that the action should be dismissed.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, found that the pursuers the Tinnevely Sugar Refining Company, Limited, had not set forth on record any title to sue, and that the pursuers Darley & Butler had not set forth averments relevant to support the conclusions of the summons in so far as related to themselves, and therefore dismissed the action.

Burnie's Trust-
tee v. Lawrie.

Succession—Testament—Writ—Unsubscribed holograph writing underneath subscribed holograph settlement.—A holograph writing, occurring below the subscription to a holograph trust-settlement, and containing bequests of specific articles, held (dub. Lord Rutherford Clark) to be effectual, as part of the trust-settlement, although not itself subscribed.

THIS was a special case presented for the determination of questions as to the testamentary validity and effect of certain writings left by Hugh Burnie, Agnew Crescent, Wigtown, who died on 3d December 1893. 2D DIVISION.

The first of these writings was a holograph paper, dated 22d November 1893, in these terms:—"In the event of my death without heirs of my body, I leave and bequeath to Christina Shaw or Lawrie, wife of Sampson Lawrie, tailor, Liverpool, the property in Whithorn belonging to her late brother James Shaw, Whithorn, together with the railway stock in my name of Portpatrick and Wigtownshire Joint Committee, with a legacy of £10 sterling for dividends drawn. As witness my hand at Wigtown the 22d day of November 1893 years." Then followed the subscription of the deceased.

The next writing was a holograph trust-disposition and settlement, dated 30th November 1893, in the following terms:—"I, Hugh Burnie, residing in Agnew Crescent, Wigtown, in order to settle my affairs, Do hereby give, grant, assign, and dispose to and in favour of John Smith, Sheriff-clerk, of Wigtownshire, and Charles Arbuthnot M'Lean, law-agent, Wigtown, all and sundry lands and heritages, goods and gear, debts and sums of money, that shall belong to me at the time of my death, and I nominate and appoint the said John Smith and Charles Arbuthnot M'Lean my sole executors, and I declare the purposes of the trust to be, (first), for payment of my just and lawful debts, deathbed, and funeral expenses; (second) for payment of following specific legacies to persons after-named" (then followed certain small pecuniary legacies, after which the writing continued), "and as both my mother and self were much benefited by the inhabitants of Wigtown, the rest residue of our joint means and estate to be divided as follows,—eight-tenths to the poor of the parish of Wigtown, one-tenth to the poor of the parish of

No. 198. Kirkinner, and one-tenth to the poor of the parish of Glasserton, said sums to be divided at the discretion of my said trustees, witness my hand at Wigtown, the 30th day of November 1893 years." Then came the subscription of the deceased.

Burnie's Trustees v. Lawrie.

Immediately beneath the subscription to the last-mentioned writing was a writing, holograph of the testator, but not subscribed by him, in the following terms:—"I have left special instructions respecting Mrs Sampsons Lawrie's legacy, and would like trinkets disposed of as follows to following kind friends, if they will accept,—

"Gold watch and chain to the Rev. Mr Paton." Then followed seven other bequests of specific articles of a similar character.

The first party to the special case, who was the sole accepting trustee under the trust-disposition and settlement of 30th November, maintained that that deed (exclusive of the unsubscribed holograph writing appended to it) was the only operative testamentary writing of the deceased, on the ground that the unsubscribed writing was ineffectual, not having been subscribed, and that the trust-disposition and settlement, construed apart from the unsubscribed writing, was to be held as by implication revoking the paper of 22d November.

Mrs Sampson Lawrie, the second party, maintained that even apart from the unsubscribed writing the trust-disposition and settlement was not to be construed as revoking the writing of 22d November; and, alternatively, that the unsubscribed writing was effectual, as being part of the trust-disposition and settlement, at all events to the extent of shewing that the writing of 22d November was intended to remain operative.

The third parties, the Rev. Mr Paton and the other persons named in the unsubscribed writing as donees of specific articles, maintained that that writing, if effectual to any extent, was effectual as regarded the bequests in their favour.

The following were the questions of law:—" (1) Is the said holograph writing of 22d November 1893 valid to the effect of entitling the said second party to the bequests thereby made by the said Hugh Burnie in her favour, or, on the other hand, has the said holograph writing of 22d November 1893 been impliedly revoked by the said trust-disposition and settlement of the said Hugh Burnie dated 30th November 1893? (2) Are the bequests in favour of the third parties contained in the said holograph writing appended to the said trust-disposition and settlement of 30th November 1893 valid or invalid?"

At the hearing, the arguments were directed exclusively to the questions of the validity of the unsubscribed writing.¹

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—Both of the questions in the present case depend on whether the postscript to the holograph disposition and settlement of 30th November is valid, or is invalid because it does not bear the subscription of the testator. If it is valid it signifies to us quite distinctly no intention on the part of the

July 17, 1894.
Burnie's Trusts-
tee v. Lawrie.

It is maintained by the first party, founding on a passage in Stair, and on the case of Skinner v. Forbes, 11 R. 88, and certain other cases, that the postscript is invalid because it is not signed. The passage in Stair is in these terms,—“Holograph writs subscribed are unquestionably the strongest probation by writ, and least irritable. But if they be not subscribed they are understood to be incomplete acts from which the party hath resiled.”

Now, I am not at all disposed to dissent from the law there laid down, which has been acted on and recognised by both Divisions of the Court. I think that as an ordinary rule a holograph writing with no signature would be held by us to be an incomplete act from which the party had resiled. But the settlement with which we are dealing is subscribed, and that being so, the question is whether the rule applies to a writing upon the same paper in the handwriting of the testator, whether at the top, or on the margin, or at the end of it. It is not a question as to the validity of an unsubscribed holograph will, but as to the validity of a holograph writing upon a subscribed holograph will and explanatory of its contents. I do not think that a case of that kind necessarily falls within the rule stated by Stair. Whether we should give effect to an unsubscribed writing appended to, or prefixed to, or on the margin of, or indorsed upon, a holograph will, which is itself subscribed, depends on circumstances, but I do not think that there is any technical or formal rule which compels us to reject such an unsubscribed writing. The rule laid down by Stair is not a rule of formality or technicality; it is one founded upon considerations of good sense, for it is plain to the human understanding that a mere unsigned jotting by a person as to how property belonging to him is to be disposed of is not a complete writing. But is that consideration at all applicable to an explanatory note prefixed, or subjoined to, or on the margin of, or indorsed upon a holograph will, which is itself duly subscribed? Suppose that it is explanatory of a person to whom the testator means to refer—“the John Jones mentioned in my will is so-and-so.” Or suppose it be a description of the subject of a legacy, so as to remove any doubt as to what the particular subject intended is. I do not think that such cases would fall within the rule as to inchoate incomplete writings. They are quite complete, explanatory of what is meant, identifying either the donee or the subject of the gift. I give them merely as illustrations of what, in my opinion, would not fall within the rule of law stated by Stair. Here the writing is explanatory of the testator having left special instructions respecting Mrs Sampson Lawrie's legacy. I think that these words indicate quite distinctly that he did not mean to imply a revocation of that legacy. I think therefore that, in so far as this writing is an explanation regarding Mrs Lawrie's legacy, it does not fall within the rule that an unsigned testament is an incomplete writ; and holding it to be good to that extent, I think that we must hold it to be good altogether, and therefore that it must have effect as regards the gifts of the trinkets as referred to in it.

My opinion on the whole matter therefore is that the first question ought to be answered to the effect that the will in favour of Mrs Lawrie is not impliedly, as it certainly is not expressly, revoked by the settlement of 30th November, the conclusion that the testator had no such intention being arrived at from the writing or note appended in his own handwriting to the settlement; and as

No. 198. regards the second question, I think that that writing is effectual as regards the legacies also.

LANARKSHIRE AND DUMBARTONSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—James Reid.

GEORGE J. F. BUCHANAN, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—D. Dundas.

THOMAS MAIN, Defender (Respondent).—Johnston—W. Thomson.

Railway—Accommodation works—Difference between owner and occupier—Railway Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), secs. 60 and 61.—The Railway Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845, enacts, by sec. 60, that the company shall make and maintain works for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers of lands adjoining the railway, and by sec. 61 that if any difference arise respecting the kind of accommodation works, the same shall be determined by the Sheriff.

Held that sec. 61 applies not only to a difference between the company and the owner and occupier, but also to a difference between the owner and the occupier, and that each of these as well as the railway company should be before the Sheriff in order to the determination of any dispute relative to the accommodation works to be executed.

Railway—Railway Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), secs. 60 and 61—Accommodation works—Reduction of Sheriff's determination.—The proprietor of lands intersected by a railway, who had agreed with the railway company as to the accommodation works to be provided, brought an action for reduction of a determination subsequently pronounced by the Sheriff as to the accommodation works on an application by the occupier of the lands under sec. 61 of the Railway Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845. The pursuer averred that he was not called as a party to the application by the defender, and that it was only at the final stage, after he had become aware of the nature of the proceedings, that he sided himself as a party and asked the Sheriff to be allowed to lodge written answers to the petition, or at least to have time given him to consider his position; that this had been refused, and that he had had no opportunity given him of stating his objections.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Low) that the pursuer's averment that the Sheriff had not allowed him time to inform himself as to the proceedings was a relevant ground of reduction.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

THOMAS MAIN, market gardener, near Bowling, and tenant under a nineteen years' lease, dated 1888, of a piece of ground belonging to Mr Buchanan of Auchentorlie, and occupied by Main as a flower and fruit garden, having differed with the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company as to the accommodation works to be provided for the garden, under the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Dumbarton praying the Sheriff to determine the matter in dispute.*

* The Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c.

On 9th August 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Gebbie) issued an inter-locutor in which, "having heard parties' procurators, and considered the cause with the assistance of Mr Robertson," a civil engineer whom he had called in to inspect the ground along with him, he determined the accommodation works to be provided by the railway company, and, inter alia, ordained them to erect an underbridge.

Lanarkshire
and Dumbartonshire Railway Co. v.
Main.

On 25th September 1893 the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company and Mr Buchanan raised an action against Main concluding for reduction of the Sheriff-substitute's determination.

The pursuers averred, inter alia, that the railway company had arranged with Mr Buchanan, as owner of the land, all the necessary accommodation works, including a level crossing and roads for the purpose of connecting the severed portions of the garden ground, and that a minute to that effect had been lodged in the proceedings under the application in the Sheriff Court.

"The pursuer Mr Fergusson Buchanan was not called as a party to this application by the defender, and it was only at the final stage after he had become aware of the nature of the proceedings that he sisted himself as a party, and asked the Sheriff to be allowed to lodge written answers to the petition, or at least to have time given to him to consider his position. This was, however, refused, and he protested against this refusal, and has had no opportunity given to him of stating his objections. . . . Explained further that Mr Fergusson Buchanan's procurator was unable to state his case properly, owing to the manner in which the procedure was conducted.

"The said finding and determination is incompetent and irregular, and ought to be set aside. . . . In pronouncing the said finding the Sheriff-substitute altogether ignored these facts (1) that the proprietor of the land had already arranged with the railway company for all the accommodation works rendered necessary on his lands by the construction of the railway; (2) that the proprietor was very strenuously opposed to the accommodation works sought in the application, as well as to those determined by the Sheriff-substitute; (3) that he was refused an opportunity of lodging written answers to the defender's petition, although written statements had already been lodged for the defender and the railway company; (4) that no time was allowed to the proprietor to consider the works proposed so as to adequately discuss the objections to same."

Other grounds of reduction were stated for the pursuers, which it is unnecessary here to advert to.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—1. The said finding and determination is incompetent and irregular, and ought to be reduced . . . (2) because the pursuers the said railway company had already arranged with the proprietor of the said land the accommodation works rendered necessary by the construction of the railway; (3) because the pursuer Mr Fergusson Buchanan, after being sisted as a party to the application, was not allowed to lodge a written statement in answer to the application, or allowed time to consider the same, so as adequately to state his objections.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—5. The pursuers' averments being 33), enacts, sec. 60,—“The company shall make and all times thereafter maintain the following works for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers of land adjoining the railway. . . .”

Sec. 61.—“If any difference arise respecting the kind or number of any such accommodation works . . . the same shall be determined by the Sheriff or two Justices. . . .”

irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the present action should be dismissed, with expenses.

On 27th April 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Low) sustained the defender's fifth plea in law and dismissed the action.*

The pursuers reclaimed. Mr Buchanan argued;—The Sheriff had declined to hear him on a question that was of great importance, and with reference to which he was opposed to the tenant, but there was no warrant in the Act for the Sheriff to decide what works should be executed without first hearing all parties interested. Here the work proposed threatened a very serious injury to Mr Buchanan's property.

* "OPINION.—The finding of the Sheriff-substitute is sought to be reduced upon five grounds, which are stated in the pursuers' pleas in law. . . .

"2. It is said in the second place that the railway company had already arranged with the proprietor of the land the accommodation works rendered necessary by the construction of the railway.

"It is admitted that the railway company and the proprietor arranged that the several portions of the land should be connected by a level crossing, but it is also admitted that the defender was no party to the arrangement. The question, therefore, is whether the fact that the owner of the land has agreed to accept certain accommodation works as sufficient precludes the occupier from demanding that additional works shall be executed.

"It seems to me that that question must be answered in the negative. The accommodation works which a railway company is taken bound by the Railway Clauses Act to execute are such as are necessary for the protection of both owner and occupier, and I am of opinion that the owner cannot, without the knowledge or consent of his tenant, discharge the company of their statutory obligation to make such accommodation works as are necessary for the protection of the occupier, or deprive the occupier of his right to demand that such works shall be executed. That is the view of the statute which appears to have been taken by the Court of Appeal in England in the case of Corry v. Great Western Railway Company, 7 Q. B. D. p. 323.

"3. The third ground of reduction is that the pursuer, Mr Fergusson Buchanan, the owner of the lands, was not allowed to lodge written answers to the defender's application to the Sheriff, or allowed time to consider the application, so as adequately to state his objections.

"It was argued for the defender that the pursuer had no title to appear in the proceedings before the Sheriff. I should hesitate to affirm that proposition, because the owner of lands has a clear interest in regard to the nature of proposed accommodation works. I do not, however, require to express an opinion upon the point, as upon other grounds I am against the pursuers.

"Mr Fergusson Buchanan appeared and asked to be sisted as a party to the process, apparently after the Sheriff-substitute had inspected the ground. The Sheriff-substitute sisted Mr Buchanan as a party, but found that it was not necessary for him to lodge answers to the petition, and also, Mr Buchanan avers (and, I assume, truly), refused to allow him time to consider his position. It is not disputed that the Sheriff-substitute heard Mr Buchanan's agent, and therefore the ground of reduction which I am now considering is reduced to this, that the Sheriff-substitute found that it was not necessary for Mr Buchanan to lodge answers, and refused to grant delay. These were both matters in my opinion which were within the discretion of the Sheriff-substitute. If he had refused to sist Mr Buchanan, or to hear him after he had been sisted, the question would have been very different. But having heard Mr Buchanan, I think that it was competent for the Sheriff to determine whether there was any necessity for written pleadings being lodged or for further delay. . . .

"Upon the whole matter I am of opinion that the pursuers have not stated relevant grounds of reduction, and that the defender is entitled to have the action dismissed."

It was idle to say that Mr Buchanan had had an opportunity of stating his objections. No. 199.

It is unnecessary for the purposes of this report to advert to the other points argued by Mr Buchanan and by the Railway Company. July 17, 1894.

way Co. v.
Main.

Argued for the defender;—This was practically an arbitration,¹ in which the Sheriff's judgment was final. No relevant ground for reducing it had been stated.² It was in the discretion of the Sheriff to determine how far it was necessary to hear parties. In point of fact he had heard Mr Buchanan's agent, who had thus an opportunity of making any explanation he liked. The Court should not interfere with the Sheriff's discretion.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuers of this action impugn the validity of certain proceedings before the Sheriff-substitute of Dumbartonshire, acting under the 61st section of the Railways Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845. It is necessary first to consider what are the rights of landlord and tenant respectively under the 60th as well as the 61st section.

The 60th section obliges railway companies to execute the necessary works, of the kind there specified, "for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers of lands adjoining the railway." Now, I take it that the section treats the owners and occupiers as the persons interested in the land, and concerned to get the works necessary for its beneficial use. That is their common interest. In the vast majority of cases their needs will coincide. It is, however, possible that the owner and occupier may differ, and even that their interests may differ, as to what are the proper works to be required of the company. Both are to be accommodated; and the interests of both are to be considered in fixing the accommodation works.

Accordingly it is clear that the owner cannot, by agreement with the railway company, conclude the question what works shall be executed, so as to preclude the demand of the tenant for what he deems necessary. If the company choose to treat with the owner alone and to bind themselves to him, they cannot, merely on account of this obligation, refuse to listen to the tenant if he asks for something else. On the other hand the owner has a clear right to be heard to object to a work which the occupier demands, if that work would be injurious to the property.

It is thus manifest that differences may arise about accommodation works not merely between the owner and occupier, as collectively representing the land, on the one hand, and the company on the other hand, but also between the owner and occupier themselves. When therefore, the 61st section says "if any difference arise respecting the kind or number of such accommodation works" "the same shall be determined by the Sheriff," the enactment applies to the case where the owner and occupier are at variance and the company sides with one of them. It is also obvious that in order to the determination of any dispute about accommodation works it is necessary that the three parties interested should all be before the Sheriff. The duty of the Sheriff is then to decide how the interests of owner and occupier (the one permanent and the other temporary) may be harmonised in due accordance with the interests of the rail-

Well now, in the present case the owner and the company came to an agreement, without consulting the occupier. He then made his own demands, which were not acceded to; and the occupier and the company, having thus differed, went to the Sheriff. Written pleadings were ordered; the occupier stated his demands, which were large, and the company, in their answers, stated that they had arranged with the owner, and that the owner strongly objected to some of the works demanded by the occupier as being injurious to the property.

There was thus disclosed to the Sheriff a difference between the owner and the occupier, as well as between the occupier and the company; and if the Sheriff had noticed it, I cannot but think he would have seen that the landlord must be brought into the proceedings if they were to be effective. The Sheriff, however, went on without ordering intimation to the owner; he appointed a meeting on the ground for an inspection; he appointed Mr William Robertson, a civil engineer, to accompany him to the inspection; he met parties (to wit the occupier and the company), on the ground and heard their explanations. Having done so, he appointed them to be heard on the whole cause on a day fixed. On the day thus appointed for debate, the owner, for the first time, appeared; and he craved to be sisted as a party to the action. His right to be sisted was in my opinion indisputable. The Sheriff, however, dealt with the application in a rather singular way, for the interlocutor of 7th August 1893, bears,—“In respect he [the owner] has, in answer to the call made upon him at the bar, produced two agreements between him and the respondents relative to the ground in question, sists the said George James Fergusson Buchanan as craved: Finds it is not necessary for the said George James Fergusson Buchanan to lodge answers to the petition; and having heard parties' procurators on the whole cause, in presence of Mr Robertson, makes avizandum.” By a subsequent interlocutor two days later, the Sheriff fixed the works to be executed. With his decision both the railway company and Mr Buchanan are grievously dissatisfied.

Now, as I have already said, Mr Buchanan, as owner, was not only a proper, but in the circumstances of this case, a necessary party to the determination of the question what works were to be executed on his own property. He was unfortunately not made a party to the proceedings; and, as I think also unfortunately, the proceedings were not intimated to him when the Sheriff was apprised of the difference between him and the occupier. As regards the sequel, his case upon record amounts to the following,—The proceedings came to his knowledge after the Sheriff had examined the ground and heard the explanations of the parties and the views of the engineer whom the Sheriff had called to his aid. In short, when Mr Buchanan appeared and asked to be sisted, the inquiry had taken place; and all that remained to be done was that the parties' procurators should be heard on the results of the inquiry. Under these circumstances, it was manifestly impossible that Mr Buchanan or his agent could, to any purpose, make a speech about an inquiry of which he knew nothing; and to propose to hear him then and there was practically to refuse to hear him at all. What Mr Buchanan's agent is alleged to have proposed was, I think, very reasonable; he asked to be allowed to lodge written answers, or at least to have time given him to consider his position. These requests the pursuers allege to have been refused, and all that was allowed to Mr Buchanan was already pointed out, was entirely illusory.

Now, I should be slow to say that an award under this section could be set aside merely because the Sheriff deemed a written statement unnecessary in the case of an owner who came and verbally explained his position, even although the other parties had had the advantage of written pleadings. But in the present case the owner was not merely refused the opportunity of stating his views in writing, as the others had done, but (what is much more important) he was refused time to inform himself about what had been done in the proceedings, and was only allowed to be heard if he went on to speak of what he necessarily knew nothing.

Such being the averments, they seem to me to constitute a relevant ground of reduction. The pursuers' case is, that Mr Buchanan, being a proper party to the proceeding, was practically, although not formally, refused a hearing. I do not think that an arbiter's award could be supported in such circumstances; and the Sheriff's decision under the 61st section is, for present purposes, in the same position as an arbiter's award.

My opinion is, therefore, that the pursuers' averments are relevant, that the pursuers are entitled to prove them, and that the interlocutor having been pronounced on a record closed on preliminary defences, the case must go back to the Outer-House for the requisite procedure.

LORD ADAM.—The defender is tenant under the pursuer Mr Buchanan of some ten acres of ground used as a market garden. The ground is intersected by the line of railway which the other pursuers, the railway company, are in course of constructing.

The proceedings complained of had their origin in a petition presented to the Sheriff-substitute, under section 61 of the Railway Clauses Act, praying him to determine as to the accommodation works to be made and maintained by the railway company under the 60th section. It was quite a competent application by the tenant. But it does not appear to me that the statute contemplated two entirely distinct sets of works, one for the owner and one for the tenant and occupier. The owner, therefore, should have been made a party to the proceedings from the first. But he was not made a party, and the proceedings went on in his absence.

What took place was this: The Sheriff-substitute appointed the petitioner to lodge a statement of the accommodation works claimed. The railway company lodged answers, and on considering them the Sheriff-substitute appointed parties to meet him on the ground. All that was quite unobjectionable. On 4th August 1893 the Sheriff-substitute appointed Mr Robertson, C.E., to accompany him to the inspection, and having met the parties on the ground and heard their explanations in presence of Mr Robertson, appointed them to be heard on the whole cause. It is said by the pursuers that this was an incompetent proceeding, and that it nullified all future proceedings. It is said by the pursuers that having appointed Mr Robertson assessor the Sheriff-substitute had no more to do. Contra it is said, and this view is adopted by the Lord Ordinary, that the Sheriff-substitute was entitled to have the assistance of a man of skill, and that it is in accordance with ordinary practice to remit to a man of skill to report, and that the only difference was that he obtained a verbal in place of a written report. It is not necessary to determine whether that is incompetent or not.

But with reference to what afterwards took place there is this material distinction. If there had been a written report (and men of skill are not infallible) Mr Buchanan would have had an opportunity of pointing out erroneous statements or conclusions, but being a verbal report he had, and could have, no knowledge of the advice given, however erroneous.

What next took place was that on 7th August 1893 the Sheriff-substitute sisted Mr Buchanan as a party, refused him leave to lodge answers to the petition, called on his procurator then and there to address him on the whole case, made avizandum, and thereafter disposed of the case on the merits. The effect of this was that the Sheriff gave the pursuer no opportunity of seeing the process and proceedings after he had become a party to it. He may have been quite right in thinking written answers unnecessary, but he gave the pursuer no opportunity of substantiating his objections by evidence or otherwise, and he called on him then and there to speak to questions of fact of which he had no knowledge, not having been a party to any of the prior proceedings in the cause, and there being no written record of these proceedings. It is averred on record that this was done in face of a protest by the pursuer. The averment is, that he, Mr Buchanan, asked the Sheriff to be allowed to lodge written answers to the petition, or at least to have time given him to consider his position; that this was refused, and he protested against the refusal, and has had no opportunity given to him of stating his objections. If this be true, I think that substantial justice has not been done to the pursuer, and that there must be inquiry.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Process—Multiplepoinding—Expenses.—In January and February 1893 Mr W. H. H. C. Moubray sold certain lots of timber to William Hepburn, timber-merchant, 16 Downfield Place, Edinburgh. Thereafter, while part of the timber was as yet undelivered, John Rex, wood-merchant, Leith, a creditor of John Hepburn, William Hepburn's son, used arrestments in Moubray's hands, alleging that the timber had truly been sold to William Hepburn as agent for John Hepburn. Rex then brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Fife against Moubray and John Hepburn and also against Walter Shaw, the trustee on William Hepburn's sequestrated estates, in which he claimed the undelivered timber. Shaw, as trustee, alone lodged defences, maintaining that the timber belonged to William Hepburn, and was carried by his sequestration. On 14th November 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Gillespie) sisted process in this action in order that a multiplepoinding might be brought.

Shaw, as trustee, accordingly brought a multiplepoinding in name of Moubray. Rex and Shaw alone lodged claims. The Second Division of the Court, recalling the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, sustained No. 200. Shaw's claim.

Shaw then moved that Rex should be found liable not merely in the expenses of the competition but also in the expenses of bringing the action. Shaw argued that, as he would have been found entitled to full expenses had the original petitory action gone on to judgment, he ought not to be subjected to the expenses of bringing the action of multiplepointing, as he would be if these expenses were found to be a charge on the fund in medio. Rex maintained that the expenses of bringing the action ought to be charged against the fund in medio. The Court (the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Rutherford Clark, and Lord Trayner) held that the expenses of bringing the action fell to be paid out of the fund in medio, it being observed on the bench that that was the invariable rule when the multiplepointing was competently brought.

The marriage was dissolved by the death of the husband. He left a trust-settlement by which he, inter alia, provided,—“Sixth, In the event of there being no issue of our marriage alive at my death, or in the event of there being issue and their dying before the youngest of them attaining the foresaid age of twenty-one years complete, I direct my trustees” to convey the marriage-contract trust-estate to his widow, whom failing, to certain other persons named, “whom in the foresaid order I hereby appoint to be my residuary legatees and nominees under the said antenuptial contract of marriage.”

Donaldson's
Donaldson.

The marriage was dissolved by the death of Mr Donaldson on 22d July 1866, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, the sixth purpose of which was in these terms:—"Sixth, In the event of there being no issue of our marriage alive at my death, or in the event of there being issue and their dying before the youngest of them attaining the foresaid age of twenty-one years complete, I direct my trustees, after payment of the pecuniary legacies mentioned in the third head of the purposes of this trust, and left and bequeathed by me, in the foresaid events to pay or convey the fee of the residue of said estate, including the fee of the subjects, policies, and others conveyed by me under the said antenuptial contract of marriage, to and in favour of the said Isabella Stirling or Donaldson, my spouse, in the event of her surviving me, whom failing, to the said Jane Donaldson or Henderson, James T. Donaldson, and William Donaldson [two brothers and a sister of the testator] equally, share and share alike, and survivors or survivor of them, whom in the foresaid order I hereby appoint to be my residuary legatees and nominees under the said antenuptial contract of marriage."

Mr Donaldson was survived by one child of the marriage, a daughter (Mrs Honeyman), who attained the age of twenty-one, and died intestate and without issue on 1st September 1893. She was survived by her mother.

In these circumstances a special case was presented by (1) Mr and Mrs Donaldson's marriage-contract trustee; (2) Mrs Donaldson; (3) James T. Donaldson and Mrs Henderson, Mr Donaldson's brother and sister (William Donaldson was dead); (4) Mr and Mrs Honeyman's marriage-contract trustee. The following was the first question of law:—" (1) In the events which have occurred, does George Donaldson's trust-disposition and settlement have the effect of constituting the second party nominee under his antenuptial contract of marriage so as to entitle her to the capital of the trust-estate created by said contract of marriage? Or did the capital of the said trust-estate vest in Mrs Honeyman at her father's death as his nearest heir ab intestato?" Then followed other questions not necessary to be here mentioned.

The second party maintained that by the final words of the sixth purpose of his trust-disposition and settlement, Mr Donaldson had exercised the power of nomination reserved to him by the third purpose of the antenuptial contract, to the effect of giving her the fee of the estates.

The other parties contended that the terms of Mr Donaldson's trust-disposition and settlement did not, in the events which had occurred, constitute an exercise of the reserved power of nomination, Mrs Honeyman having attained the age of twenty-one before her death, and consequently that the marriage-contract trust-estate fell to be disposed of as intestate succession of Mr Donaldson.

LORD YOUNG.—The question which we have here to determine is whether the late Mr Donaldson by the sixth purpose of his will shewed that he intended to exercise—and validly exercised—the power of nomination conferred on him by his antenuptial marriage-contract. It is said, on the one hand, that he did not, because the operation of the sixth purpose of the will is limited to the event of there being no issue of the marriage, or if there was issue, to the event of their all dying before the youngest of them attained the age of twenty-one, and as neither of these contingencies happened, since his daughter (who became Mrs Honeyman) survived her father, and was more than twenty-one years of age at the time of her death, it is maintained that the condition of this clause coming into operation not having been purified, the clause is of no effect. On the other hand, it is said that the plain meaning and intention of the testator to be gathered from this clause as a whole and from his will as a whole, is that he intended to exercise the power given to him by the marriage-contract to destine the estate in the events which have happened; that this satisfactorily and conclusively appears from the words at the end of the clause "whom in the fore-said order I hereby appoint to be my residuary legatees and nominees under the said antenuptial contract of marriage"; and that it would be unreasonable to thwart and defeat what must occur to everybody to be the probable intention of the testator by qualifying these words by the introduction of the words "in the foresaid events,"—that is to say, in the event of there being no issue, or in the event of the issue, should there be issue, all dying before the youngest attained the age of twenty-one. I do not think that it is necessary, as a matter of construction, to read that qualification into the concluding words of the clause. I think that they may very well be read without that qualification, and so reading them we give effect to what I am persuaded was the intention of the testator. I am therefore of opinion that in the events which have occurred Mr Donaldson's trust-disposition and settlement has the effect of constituting his widow nominee under the antenuptial contract, so as to entitle her to the capital of the trust-estate.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, LORD TRAYNER, and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

Contract—Constitution—Advertisement—Condition precedent—Insurance—Next of kin.—The proprietors of a newspaper advertised that £100 would be paid by an insurance company named to the person whom the proprietors of the newspaper "may decide to be the next of kin of anyone who is killed in a railway accident," provided that a copy of the current issue was in his possession at the time of the accident, or that he was a regular subscriber to the newspaper.

In an action against the proprietors of the paper, by the children and sole next of kin of a subscriber to the paper, who had been killed by a railway accident, for payment of the sum mentioned in the advertisement, the defence was that the defenders had decided that the widow of the deceased was his next of kin; that under the terms of the advertisement they were entitled so to decide; and that the money had been paid to her.

The Court, after a proof, assolized the defenders, being of opinion that it was a condition precedent to requiring payment of the sum mentioned in the advertisement that the person claiming the money should produce the decision of the proprietors of the paper that he was the next of kin of the deceased, and that the pursuers had failed to prove that the defenders in refusing to decide that the pursuers were next of kin of the deceased had acted in bad faith.

Question (per Lord Young) whether any valid contract had been constituted,

No. 202. ON 22d September 1893 Henry Law and others, being the children of the late Robert Law, painter, 207 Causewayside, Edinburgh, brought an action for payment of £100 against George Newnes, Limited, Southampton Street, Strand, London, the proprietors of a weekly periodical called Tit-Bits.

Law v. George

Ld. Kyllachy.

The pursuers set forth the advertisement quoted below,* and averred that the defenders had established a system of insurance against railway accident in terms of the advertisement, which appeared in each weekly issue of their periodical Tit-Bits; that the pursuer's father was a regular subscriber, through a newsagent, to Tit-Bits, and as such contracted with the defenders for the benefit of their system of insurance, under which in the event of his death by railway accident his next of kin were to be entitled to payment of £100; that he had died on 4th August 1893 from injuries received in a railway accident at Dundee on 28th July; that the pursuers were his children by his first marriage, and were his only children and sole next of kin; that, as such, they had claimed from the defenders the benefit of their system of insurance, but that the defenders had refused to admit the pursuers' claim, and had intimated that they had decided that Mrs Law, the second wife of the deceased, was his next of kin; and that the money had been paid to her. (Cond. 6) "In so acting and deciding that the deceased's widow was of the next of kin of the deceased, the defenders acted and decided illegally and wrongfully, and in bad faith, and in complete disregard of the terms of their said offer, and of the rights acquired thereunder by the pursuers, among whom there are no competing claims, and against whom no other person has or could intimate to the defenders that such person claimed as next of kin of the deceased. The defenders were not only well aware, before resolving to prefer the deceased's widow to the said sum of £100, that she was not, and did not claim as one of the next of kin of the deceased, but were also aware that the pursuers were his only next of kin."

The defenders admitted that the pursuer's father had died as averred by them, and that he had complied with the conditions of the advertisement. They further admitted that they had decided that Mrs Law was the next of kin of the deceased and had refused to admit the pursuers' claim, and that she had been paid. The defenders' answer to cond. 6 was "Denied," and in their statement of facts they stated,—(Stat. 4) "By the defenders' system of insurance, and under the terms and conditions thereof, as stipulated by them, it is not contemplated or intended that the benefits of the insurance should be confined to the nearest blood relations of the deceased, and in coming to the decision that the deceased's widow was the party entitled to the £100 payable on the deceased's death as aforesaid, and in making payment of that amount to her, the defenders acted in perfect good faith, in accordance with their usual practice, and also in accordance with the provisions of the advertisement founded on by the pursuers."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having contracted with the deceased Robert Law to pay the sum of £100 to his next of kin in the event as such has occurred, all as condescended on, and the pursuers, No. 202. being the sole next of kin of the deceased, are entitled to decree against the defenders for payment thereof, with interest and expenses, as craved. July 17, 1894.

* The following was the advertisement,—“£100 will be paid by the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation, Limited, 40, 42, and 44 Moorgate Street, London, E.C., to the person whom the proprietors of Tit-Bits may decide to be the next of kin of anyone who is killed in a railway accident in the United Kingdom, provided a copy of the current issue of Tit-Bits is found upon the deceased at the time of the catastrophe, or if it is proved that he or she is a subscriber through a newsagent or through the publishers. This sum will not be paid in the event of an accident to a railway servant when on duty, nor of a suicide. No claim will be paid in the case of the death of a child under ten years of age.”

Law v. George

Limited.
(2) The defenders having illegally and wrongfully paid, or caused to be paid, the said sum of £100 to a person not being one of the next of kin of said subscriber, the pursuers are entitled to decree, as concluded for, with interest and expenses.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant. (3) Under the conditions of the insurance in question the defenders were entitled to pay the amount insured to the deceased's widow, and having in good faith decided that she was the party entitled to the said payment, and paid the amount to her, they have discharged their obligation under the said insurance.

On 21st February 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the second plea in law for the defenders, and assoilzies them from the conclusions of the action."*

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The contention of the defenders came to this, that they were entitled to pay this £100 to any person whom they chose to select and to call the next of kin of the deceased. That contention was ill-founded. The advertisement here, coupled with the purchase of, or subscription to, the paper constituted a contract on the part of the defenders to pay £100, in certain events, to the next of kin of one who was killed by a railway accident.¹ In using the well-defined technical term "next of kin," the defenders must be held to have had something more in view than their own arbitrary choice. No doubt the advertisement ran "to the person whom the proprietors may decide to be the next of kin." That qualification supplied a rough and ready method of determining who in fact were the next of kin, but it did nothing more.² If, for example, the defenders decided that so-and-so was the next of kin, and someone came forward alleging that he was nearer of kin, or that he also was of the next of kin, he would probably have no action. But the defenders were not entitled to give the money to one who was not, and never could be, next of kin of the deceased, as they had done, in giving the money to the widow here. A wife, as such, was not of kin to her husband, and, consequently, never could be his next of kin—either by the law of Scotland or by the law of England. At all events, assuming that, in the absence of a claim by the next of kin, the

* "OPINION.— . . . I am of opinion that the pursuers have no title to sue, or at least, that their title is excluded by the decision of the defenders in favour of the widow. The defenders' obligation was not to pay to the next of kin but to such persons as the defenders might decide to be the next of kin. Prima facie, therefore, their decision was a condition precedent of the right to sue, and although it may probably be true that if they delayed or refused to decide, or decided in bad faith, or otherwise acted in the matter dishonestly, the next of kin might have a right of action to enforce the contract, there is plainly no room in the present case for any suggestion of that kind. The widow was certainly not the next of kin, or one of the next of kin according to the law of Scotland, or, so far as I know, according to the law of England; but the question after all was what the defenders meant by the expression as used in their advertisement, and of that they reserved to themselves to be the sole judges. They decided in favour of the widow, so far as appears from no interested motive, and quite honestly, and that being so, they cannot, in my opinion, be required to pay over again to the pursuers. I propose, therefore, to find that the pursuers' statements are irrelevant, and assoilzie the defenders from the action."

Argued for the defenders ;—The pursuers had no title to sue. Under the advertisement, it was a condition precedent of an action upon the contract that the pursuer should produce the decision of the proprietors of Tit-Bits that he was next of kin of the deceased.¹ This the pursuers had not done. Nor could it be said that the defenders had not acted bona fide in preferring the widow, who if she was not strictly next of kin of the deceased was at all events one of his heirs in mobilibus.² It was not therefore necessary for the defenders to maintain that they were entitled to prefer anyone whom they chose, but, upon a construction of the advertisement, they maintained that their discretion was absolute, and consequently that the pursuers' averments were irrelevant. They did not, however, object to a proof before answer, if there were any matters of fact in dispute. They raised no question as to its being the Ocean Insurance Company, and not themselves, who ought to have been called as defenders.

On 15th March 1894 the Court allowed a proof before answer.

The evidence, which was led before the Lord Justice-Clerk, shewed that a claim was lodged on behalf of Mrs Law on 8th August, that after making inquiries into the circumstances attending the death of the deceased, and as to his having been a regular subscriber to Tit-Bits, the defenders, through their managing director, intimated to Mrs Law, on 19th August, that, "after full inquiries have been made into the circumstances attending the sad accident which caused the death of your husband at Tay Bridge Station, it has been found you are entitled to the benefits of the Tit-Bits system of insurance. A cheque for £100 will be sent you during the course of next week." A notice to the same effect was inserted in the next issue of Tit-Bits. The first intimation to the defenders of the pursuers' claim was made on 21st August. The cheque for £100 was sent to Mrs Law on 23d August. English counsel deponed that, according to English law, a wife was in no sense whatever of the next of kin of her husband, unless related to him by birth.

After further hearing the Court made avizandum with the cause.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The defenders in their weekly newspaper announced that £100 would be paid by the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Association to "the person whom the proprietors of Tit-Bits may decide to be the nearest of kin of anyone who is killed in a railway accident" in the United Kingdom, provided a copy of the current number of their paper was found upon the deceased, or that the person was proved to be a subscriber. The deceased Robert Law was killed in such circumstances, and his widow applied for payment of the insurance. The proprietors of Tit-Bits, through their managing director, decided in her favour, and so intimated. After he had done so, and before the money was paid, the children of the deceased by a former marriage intimated a claim. The defender, however, considering, it may be presumed, that having given his decision the matter was ended, gave effect to his decision by forwarding a cheque to the widow. The children now sue him for the £100.

² Tronsons v. Tronson, Nov. 2, 1884, 12 R. 155.

The proprietors were entitled, in advertising such an insurance as they did, No. 202. to prescribe their own conditions, and these, as described, imply that there were to be no elaborate proceedings, but that the decision was to be that of the proprietors acting upon their own judgment. They could not be required to wait for any indefinite time, or to advertise for claims, or anything of that kind, but were entitled to proceed in their own way. Here a claim did reach them from the widow, they considered the claim, and gave a decision on the claim. That decision is admittedly erroneous from a legal point of view, but the question is, Can those who, in law, hold the place of next of kin, come forward and sue for the amount merely on the allegation that they are the next of kin, and that the person decided to be the next of kin was not so in reality? I have come to be of opinion that they cannot. The proprietors, having kept the power of decision in their own hands, exercised it, and although in doing so they must be held to have blundered grievously in their judgment, the question is, Can they be called to account in a Court of law, and, because they have blundered, be decreed to pay the money over again? I think that they cannot. I do not think that the pursuers could have any relevant ground for reducing what was done. But this is not a case of reduction but one of demand by persons who have not been decided by the proprietors of Tit-Bits to be nearest of kin to compel them to pay £100 to them because they are in that position. They are not, as I think, entitled to such a judgment. I am in favour, therefore, of adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

July 17, 1894.
Newnes,
Limited.

LORD YOUNG.—I am disposed to concur in the result at which your Lordship has arrived. The defenders do not, of course, raise any question regarding their liability to pay to the person decided by themselves to be the next of kin of the deceased, for they have paid over the money. But I must say that I have myself very great doubts—although it is not necessary to decide the question in this case—as to the validity of an insurance effected in the way here described,—I do not refer to any question under the Stamp Act. The pursuers seek to deal with the advertisement plus the fact of subscription to the newspaper as a policy of insurance effected by onerous contract between the proprietor of the newspaper and the deceased, the payees—that is, the creditors under the policy—being the next of kin of the deceased according to the law of Scotland. The pursuers' first plea in law is to the effect that the defenders, having contracted with the deceased to pay the sum of £100 to his next of kin in the event of his being killed by a railway accident, are liable to the pursuers as creditors in that obligation.

Now, I am of opinion that there is here no such contract. I should think that if anyone made a contract with an insurance office, or with any person willing to insure, that a certain sum should be paid to his next of kin in the event of his death, the amount so due under the policy would be part of his estate, and liable for his debts. I cannot think that doubtful. The next of kin could not gratuitously take anything which was due under an onerous contract with the deceased, although made payable to his next of kin, without being liable, to that extent, for his debts. But, apart from that consideration, I do not think that there was anything of the nature of a contract undertaken by the proprietors of Tit-Bits here. My own strong inclination is that the only sanction of their undertaking was the credit of the paper. The purpose of the advertisement, which need not be in their own paper at all, I think, is to further the

No. 202. interests of the paper. They wish thereby to induce people to purchase Tit-Bits, and I suppose it is successful in that result, or otherwise they would not continue to insert it. Now, the credit of the paper will depend, so far as this advertisement is concerned, upon the proprietors honestly and honourably fulfilling their undertaking, and would be hurt by a discreditable failure on their part. And accordingly, when an accident coming within the terms of the advertisement occurs, and they pay £100 to anyone, they do not fail to announce the fact in their paper. And if they did not pay in circumstances which would make their refusal discreditable to them, and against the good faith of the undertaking, that would be made public somehow, and would be disadvantageous to the paper, just as, on the other hand, the announcement of proper payment is advantageous. I am doubtful if it can be made more of than that. I hesitate to allow to pass without an expression of doubt the idea which is presented to us by this case, that there is here a valid contract or obligation by the law of Scotland to pay £100,—that it is a valid policy of insurance. That question was not argued to us, and we have no occasion to decide it here, but I have felt it to be my duty, when the question is involved in the case presented to us, to indicate, and to indicate pretty decidedly, the doubt which I experience.

Apart from these considerations I am of opinion that there is here no undertaking by the proprietor of Tit-Bits to pay £100 to those who are the next of kin of the deceased according to the law of Scotland. The Lord Ordinary says in his note, quite accurately, that the widow of the deceased is not his next of kin according to the law of Scotland, and he does not know,—has no reason to know,—that she is his next of kin, or one of his next of kin, according to the law of England. But the obligation here is not to pay to the next of kin according to the law of Scotland, or according to the law of England, or of Ireland, or according to the law of the domicile of the deceased, which might be anywhere, because he might be a foreigner. It is to pay to the person who shall be determined by the proprietor of Tit-Bits to be the next of kin of the deceased. That is a condition of the obligation, assuming that there is an obligation,—an enforceable obligation,—at all. Now, I cannot see that there is anything reprehensible, in any point of view, anything discreditable to the paper in any way, in the proprietor of Tit-Bits saying, “We think that the widow is next of kin; we are deciding nothing according to the law of Scotland, or according to the law of England, or of Ireland, or any other country where the domicile may be, but we think the widow is next of kin, and that she is the most proper person to receive the money.” It is sufficient for the decision of this case to indicate these views, and to say that there is, certainly in my opinion, no obligation upon the proprietor of Tit-Bits which can be enforced by those who are the next of kin by the law of any country, and I therefore agree that the defenders are entitled to absolver from the conclusions of this action, and with expenses.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—This action is laid on a contract of insurance which the deceased is said to have made with the defenders, through an advertisement which they are in use to issue, and it is brought to recover the amount due under that contract.

The advertisement is in these terms :—“£100 will be paid by the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation to the person whom the proprietor of Tit-Bits may decide to be the next of kin of anyone who is killed in a railway to be to furnish the next of kin of the deceased with the means of obtaining July 17, 1894.

the money from the company above mentioned. Law v. George Newnes,
Limited.

This point was not taken by the defenders. They have elected to satisfy any claim which could be made against the company. But in an action on the debt they have the same defences, and unless the pursuers can shew that they are entitled to recover against the company, I do not see how they can recover against the defenders.

In order to obtain payment from the company they were bound to produce the decision of the proprietors of Tit-Bits that they are the next of kin of the deceased. That was a plain condition precedent; for the decision of the proprietors is the only warrant on which the company could be required to pay. It is not the less a condition precedent in this action where the defenders have assumed the liabilities of the company, but have not surrendered any of their defences. The debt cannot be recovered unless the conditions precedent to the recovery are fulfilled. In so far, therefore, as the action is laid on the contract alone, I am of opinion that the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

I do not say that the pursuers would be without remedy if the defenders refused to decide, or decided in bad faith. But their action could not be laid on the contract alone. It must be laid also on the wrong. Accordingly they aver that the defenders, in deciding that the widow was next of kin, acted in bad faith, and in the knowledge that the pursuers alone possessed that character. There is no other averment.

I am of opinion that this averment is not proved. The claim was not made by the pursuers until the decision was given in favour of the widow, and was intimated to her. I think that the decision was given in good faith, and that the money was paid in the honest belief that it was due to the widow by reason of the decision in her favour.

The Lord Justice-Clerk intimated that LORD TRAYNER, who was absent, but had been present at the hearings, concurred in the judgment of the Court.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the reclaiming note, adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and decern."

Road—Public Road—Water-pipe—Compulsory Powers—Ultra vires—Railway—Statute—Construction—Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict. cap. 17), secs. 28 and 29.—Public water commissioners had statutory authority to lay a line of water-pipes along a road which passed over two girder bridges belonging to a railway company. Held, upon a construction of secs. 28 and 29 of the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847 (rev. judgment of Lord Low), that it was ultra vires of the commissioners to carry the pipes through the stone abutments of the bridges and to sling them from the girders.

donian Railway Companies, as joint owners of the Glasgow and Paisley Joint Railway, brought a note of suspension and interdict against the Lord Low.

No. 203. Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Glasgow, as Commissioners under the Glasgow Corporation Water-Works Act, 1855, and subsequent Acts, praying for interdict against the respondents "interfering in any way with the structure of the bridges (or either of them) carrying the street or road known as Helen Street, in the parish of Govan and county of Lanark, over the complainers' main line of railway between Glasgow and Paisley, and over the complainers' fork line of railway leading from their Govan Branch Railway in the direction of their said main line, and from laying on or beneath said bridges, or either of them, water pipes, and that until the respondents shall have obtained the complainers' consent to the laying of said pipes, or otherwise until the complainers and respondents shall have agreed on plans in accordance with which such water-pipes shall be laid, and failing agreement between the complainers and respondents, until their respective rights in the premises have been determined in conformity with the provisions of the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847," &c.*

Glasgow.

On 17th October the Lord Ordinary (Low) recalled an interim interdict formerly granted, and passed the note without caution. Thereafter a record was made up.

The action arose in the following circumstances, as disclosed by the admissions of the parties:—The bridge first mentioned in the prayer for interdict—that over the main line—was constructed of longitudinal girders, resting on stone abutments on each side of the railway and joined by transverse girders, between which were iron plates extended so as to

* The case turned upon the following clauses of the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict. cap. 17), which was incorporated in the Commissioners' special Acts:—

Sec. 3. "The following words and expressions, both in this and the special Acts, and any Act incorporated therewith, shall have the meanings hereby assigned to them, unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction (that is to say) . . . The word 'street' shall include any square, court or alley, highway, lane, road, thoroughfare, or public passage or place within the limits of the special Act. . . ."

Sec. 28. "The undertakers, under such superintendence as is hereinafter specified, may open and break up the soil and pavement of the several streets and bridges within the limits of the special Act, and may open and break up any sewers, drains, or tunnels within or under such streets and bridges, and lay down and place within the same limits pipes, conduits, service-pipes, and other works and engines, and from time to time repair, alter, or remove the same, and, for the purposes aforesaid, remove and use all earth and materials in and under such streets and bridges, and do all other acts which the undertakers shall from time to time deem necessary for supplying water to the inhabitants of the district included within the said limits. . . ."

Sec. 29. "Provided always that nothing herein contained shall authorise or empower the undertakers to lay down or place any pipe, conduit, service-pipe, or other work in any land not dedicated to public use, without the consent of the owners and occupiers thereof, except that the undertakers at any time may enter upon and lay or place any new pipe in the place of an existing pipe in any land wherein any pipe hath been already lawfully laid down or placed in pursuance of this or the special Act or any other Act of Parliament, and may repair or alter any pipe so laid down."

Sec. 31. "No such street, bridge, sewer, drain or tunnel, shall . . . be opened or broken up, except under the superintendence of the persons having the control or management thereof, or of their officer, and according to such plan as shall be approved of by such persons or their officer, or in case of any difference respecting such plan then according to such plan as shall be determined by two Justices. . . ."

form the floor of the bridge, the roadway being laid above. The bridge over the fork line was also constructed of longitudinal girders, resting on stone abutments, but without transverse girders, arc plates being placed between the longitudinal girders and thus forming the floor of the bridge and the basis of the roadway. Both bridges were the property of the complainers, but the complainers admitted that the roadway on each of the bridges was dedicated to the use of the public as being part of the roadway of Helen Street, which was a public street. In virtue of their Acts the respondents were authorised to lay down a line of water-pipes along Helen Street, the bridges in question, together with the railway below them, being within the limits of deviation as shewn on the deposited plans. The complainers admitted that the respondents were entitled to remove the earth forming the roadway down to the iron plates and girders so as to obtain a trench in which to lay their pipes, but this earth was not deep enough to admit of the pipes (which were 18-inch pipes) being laid above the plates and girders without projecting above the surface of the roadway. In consequence, what the respondents proposed to do—and had, in fact, carried out before the action came to be decided—was to carry the pipes through the stone abutments supporting the bridges, and, obtaining access to the space between the girders by removing the iron plates, to suspend the pipes from the girders underneath the plates, but so that the pipes were not below the girders and thus did not diminish the headway of the bridge. These operations were carried out in accordance with plans approved of by two Justices in terms of section 31 of the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847.

Glasgow and
South-Western Rail-

Glasgow.

The complainers maintained that, notwithstanding the existence of the public right of way over the bridges, the iron and stone work of the bridges remained their property, not dedicated to public use, and consequently that the respondents' operations, not being with the consent of the complainers, were outwith the statutory powers of the respondents, and therefore that interdict fell to be granted. The complainers, however, stated they were "willing to adjust plans, and allow the respondents to execute the works as proposed by them, on condition that they enter into an agreement with the complainers for their protection . . . but they decline to agree thereto."

The respondents admitted that they had declined to enter into any agreement with the complainers, and pleaded;—(1) The complainers' statements are irrelevant, and insufficient to support their pleas. (2) The respondents' operations being within their statutory rights, the note should be refused, with expenses. (3) The said street called Helen Street, and the bridges carrying the same over the complainers' railways having been dedicated to public use, the respondents are not bound to obtain the consent of the complainers before laying their mains or pipes in or over the same, or to enter into any agreement with the complainers before proceeding to lay these mains or pipes. (4) The pipes of the respondents having been laid across the said bridges in accordance with a plan approved of by the Justices in terms of section 31 of the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847, the present action should be dismissed, with expenses. (5) The surface of the roadway over said bridges and the girder work of these bridges being "land" dedicated to public use in the sense of the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847, the note should be refused.

On 27th April 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the defenders' pleas in law; refuses the prayer of the note," &c.*

The complainers reclaimed, and argued;—They did not dispute that the respondents were entitled to lay their pipes, if they could, on the roadway of the bridges, that was to say, on the earthwork above the plates and girders, the plates and girders being available to support the pipes as they supported the roadway itself. Beyond that the right of the respondents did not extend. Their right under section 28 of the Act was limited by that of the public, and the only right which the public had was a right of passage across the bridge. The bridge remained the absolute property of the complainers, and they were responsible for its proper maintenance.¹ In any case, the respondents were not within their statutory authority in doing what they had done. Section 28 was their only warrant, and what that section authorised was the breaking up of "the soil and pavement." All the subsequent powers conferred by the section had reference to and were merely intended to facilitate the exercise of that leading power. The defenders' operations went far beyond that. It might be that, looking to the date of the Act, girder bridges such as the present were not in the contemplation of the Legislature, but that was not a ground for extending the operation of the Act to cases not within its legitimate construction. Further, it was possible to carry the pipes through the roadway by increasing the depth of the earth. That might entail a considerable additional expense, but statutes empowering a public body to take private property were to be strictly construed, and a mere saving of expense was not a reason for allowing the public body to do something not expressly authorised by their Act.² The fact that the plans had been passed by two Justices was irrelevant to the present means of them that street is carried across the railway lines. The respondents, therefore, were entitled to lay a pipe in Helen Street, and I did not understand the complainers to dispute that they would also have been entitled to lay the pipe over the bridges, if it had been possible for them to lay the pipes under the surface of the roadway and above the floor of the bridge. But the complainers attempted to draw a distinction between the roadway of the bridge and the girders underneath and supporting the roadway. They argued that, although the roadway might be land dedicated to public use, the girders underneath were private property which the respondents could not interfere with or use.

"In my judgment the complainers' contention is not well founded.

"The sections of the Act which I have quoted appear to me in effect to provide that Water Commissioners may lay down pipes in streets and bridges within their district, and may perform such operations in the way of opening and breaking up the streets and bridges as are necessary to effect that object. I do not think that it is possible to construe the sections as excluding from the operations a public bridge which is constructed in such a way that there is not room for a pipe between the surface of the roadway and the floor of the bridge. In such a case I think that it is quite competent for the Commissioners to attach the pipe to the girders which support the roadway. Where, as here, a bridge has been built for the purpose of carrying a street over a line of railway, I think that it is impossible to say that the under surface is private property, and that only the upper surface is dedicated to public use. They are both parts of the same bridge, which forms a public way over the railway line.

"I am therefore of opinion that the respondents were entitled to lay the pipe across the bridge in question, and the pipe having been laid in accordance with plans approved of by two Justices in terms of the 31st section of the Act, the note falls to be refused."

question. The application to the Justices assumed that the operations were intra vires, and all that the Justices had to settle was the proper way of carrying out the operations. The complainers, therefore, were entitled to interdict; but they had no desire to prevent the respondents from having their pipes laid as they had been laid. The complainers merely desired to have an arrangement which should protect their own interests for the future, e.g., if they should have occasion to alter the bridge, or if any accident should happen to the pipes. Argued for the respondents;—The complainers admitted that the respondents were entitled to lay their pipes in the road which crossed this bridge. But road or street in such a question as the present meant more than the mere surface; it meant the surface and so much beyond as was required for the ordinary purposes of a street, including the laying water and gas pipes, or sewers.¹ If therefore the respondents were entitled to make use of this bridge at all—and it was admitted that they were entitled to make some use of it—they were entitled to pass the pipes under it as they had done. Under the Act they had power to do “all acts necessary for the purposes foresaid,” and among these purposes was the laying down of pipes. The case of the *East London Water Company*² shewed that projections above the level of the street were intra vires if necessary for the supply of water; the case of projections below the level of the roadway was a fortiori, the danger being so much less. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—But does that case shew more than that water commissioners may do all acts necessary for the supply of water assuming the pipes to be in the place authorised by the Act? Here the question is, whether your pipes are in the place authorised by the Act.] They were entitled to lay their pipes so as to carry out the water supply for which they had powers, and all acts necessary for that end were intra vires. Here the method adopted was the only practicable method of carrying the pipes across the railway, and was therefore necessary. The statute ought not to be construed so as practically to take such bridges as the present out of its scope, seeing that such bridges were unknown at the date of the statute.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The complainers are the owners of a bridge which crosses their joint railway line, and which joins two sections of Helen Street in Govan parish. The surface of this bridge is a public roadway. The Water Commissioners of Glasgow desire to carry a pipe for public water supply by this bridge. Their powers to use bridges for such a purpose are contained in the 28th section of the Water-Works Clauses Act, by which power is given to “break up the soil and pavement” of bridges within the limits of the special Act, and to “open and break up any sewers, drains, or tunnels within or under such streets and bridges, and lay down and place within the same limits pipes, conduits, service-pipes,” &c., and “to remove and use all earth and materials in and under such streets and bridges.”

The bridge in question was an iron bridge, of modern construction, consisting of several flat girders with spaces between them. Small transverse girders are placed across these main girders, and support plates which form a floor on which

Accordingly the respondents, for the purpose of carrying the mains across the railway cutting spanned by the bridge, maintain that they are entitled to remove the iron sole-plates, and thus obtain access to the space between the main girders, and to hang their water-pipes by iron bars attached to the cross girders. This, of course, renders it necessary that at each side of the cutting the pipes should pierce the stone abutments which form the solid ends of the bridge on either side of the cutting.

Glasgow and South-

way Co. v.

Glasgow.

The complainers maintain that the respondents have no right thus to support their pipes below the level of the upper sides of the main girders. They admit that the respondents have the control of that part of the bridge which forms the roadway, to the effect that they may open it up, remove the pavement, earth, or other material, and lay their pipes in the space which constitutes the filling up of the bridge, as distinguished from the weight-bearing part of the structure. But they maintain that they are not required by the statute to submit to have works carried on within the bridge, as distinguished from the roadway supported by the bridge, and that if this is to be done it can only be by agreement with them. I think that if their objection is sound in law it cannot be said to be unreasonable. For the maintaining of the supporting structure in a safe condition is a duty imposed upon them, and the safe conduct of the traffic along the lines below the bridge is an important interest which they are entitled to protect.

The question therefore is, whether it is within the powers conferred upon the respondents by the section of the Water-Works Act referred to that they should open up the structure and suspend their water-pipe from the main girders as they shall see fit, for the working of their water supply? I confess that I was at first inclined to think that as the statute was evidently intended to confer very general powers in aid of so important a public service as water supply, although the words of the Act were suitable only to the class of bridges in use to be constructed at its date, it might reasonably be held to apply, as the Lord Ordinary has held it to do, to bridges such as these in question, as entitling the respondents to break into the bridge and place their pipes, provided they do not interfere with the headway, and, of course, execute their works in a safe and sufficient manner. My inclination was to read the words of the Act as descriptive of the kind of operation then known to be necessary, and that such operations as might be necessary in consequence of a change of the character of bridges introduced by the progress of engineering invention, might be reasonably held to be included, although not in exact accordance with the words used in the statute. But after further consultation with your Lordships I am convinced that this view cannot be taken. I think that if the change in the structure of bridges had only been the substitution of a material different from soil below the roadway or of a different material at the surface from what is ordinarily called pavement, it might still be held that the powers of the respondents might be applied to such substituted materials. But this is not a case of that kind. It is a proposed application of a power, which does not relate to the weight-bearing part of the structure, to that part. The contention is that the respondents have power to cut through the cross girders, and lower their pipes into the space occupied by the weight-bearing structure, and to pierce the abutments which support the ends of the bridge and uphold the embankment on each side of the railway line, so as to introduce their pipes. This, I have come to be of opinion, is not within their powers; it is a case not contemplated by No. 203. the Act.

It would of course be against public interests if the improved construction of bridges should stop the economical and convenient passage of water supply along public streets. If it is found to have this effect the Legislature would probably provide a remedy. But I gather from the prayer of the petition that the complainers have no such desire, but properly recognising the public interests, only desire to be protected as regards their own interests in the matter of the safety of the public line. If the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is recalled, as I propose it should be, the course thereafter to be followed will depend upon what is proposed by the parties.

Glasgow.

LORD YOUNG.—My impression on this case was rather in accordance with the Lord Ordinary's judgment, but I have not such a clear opinion that I would be justified in dissenting from what I know to be the unanimous opinion of your Lordships, including Lord Trayner, and therefore I may be taken as concurring.

I wish, however, to say that it appeared to me that the requirements of the railway company, that all reasonable precautions should be taken by the town authorities that the presence of this pipe should not have a prejudicial effect upon the railway, seemed to me so reasonable that I was surprised the town should have hesitated to agree to them, because, taking the view most favourable to them, this use of the bridge for supporting their water-pipe could only be reasonable if proper precautions were taken, and I should have thought that the town would have been willing to take every proper precaution that neither the railway nor any person using the railway should receive injury.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—A street or road called Helen Street in or in the neighbourhood of Glasgow is carried over the complainers' railway by an iron bridge. The bridge is formed by longitudinal girders which rest on abutments on either side of the railway. The spaces between these girders are covered by iron plates, on which the roadway is made up.

The respondents have carried a pipe through the abutments and between the longitudinal girders. It is supported partly by the abutments and partly by being slung from the cross girders, by which the longitudinal girders are tied. Its lowest point is higher than the lowest point of the longitudinal girders. The pipe therefore does not diminish the headway of the bridge.

The pipe has been constructed on the authority of the 28th section of the Water-Works Act of 1847. It is apparent enough that the Legislature had not under their consideration bridges of the class which I have described. But it may not the less be true that the operations of the respondents are authorised by the Act. We cannot, however, extend it by any analogy. Nothing is authorised which cannot be brought within the words of the Act according to a fair and liberal construction. For, having regard to the purpose of the Act, I am of opinion that it ought to be liberally construed.

The leading words of the 28th section are that "the undertakers may open and break up the soil and pavements of the several streets and bridges within the limits of the Act." They enable the undertakers to form a trench on the roadway of the bridge, in order to lay the pipe therein. They do nothing more.

The section further empowers the undertakers "to open and break up any

No. 203. sewers, drains, or tunnels within or under such streets or bridges." It is plain, and indeed admitted, that the respondents can take no benefit from these words. They have not broken up any sewer, drain, or tunnel in or under the bridge. The section then proceeds,—“and lay down and place within the same limits pipes, &c., and from time to time alter or remove the same.” I read these words as meaning that the undertakers may lay their pipes in the places which they have made for them under the authority of the Act. It is not a power to lay down pipes anywhere within the limits of the special Act, and if it be not, the only legitimate construction is that these pipes are to be laid in the trenches which the undertakers are empowered to make, and in no other place.

The statute then goes on to say,—“And for the purposes aforesaid, remove and use all earth and materials in and under such streets and bridges, and do all other acts which the undertakers shall from time to time deem necessary for supplying water to the inhabitants of the district included within the said limits.”

The argument of the respondents was mainly founded on the power given to use the materials on and under the bridge. They said that the pipe in question was hung from the bridge, and that this was a use of the materials of the bridge within the meaning of the Act.

To my mind, the argument leaves out of account the earlier words of the section. The power is given “for the purposes aforesaid,” and for no other purpose. The words which give this power do not enlarge the enactment, except in the sense of giving facilities for doing what the statute has already permitted to be done. If the purposes aforesaid are, as the respondents contend, limited to the laying down of pipes, &c., they must be limited to pipes which are laid down in the site permitted by the Act. Before they can take any benefit from the words on which they found, the respondents must shew that the Act enables them to lay a pipe elsewhere than on the roadway of the bridge. If it is not a purpose of the Act to lay the pipes within the structure of the bridges, and for that purpose to pierce the abutments on either side, the right to use the materials in and under the bridge cannot give that power.

The respondents did not found on the general words at the close of the section, and it is plain that they can take no benefit by them.

I am therefore of opinion that the complainers are entitled to the interdict which they ask. I have been willing, as I have said, to adopt the most liberal construction, but I cannot bring the act done by the respondents within the authority of the statute.

The Lord Justice-Clerk intimated that LORD TRAYNER, who had been present at the hearing, but was absent at advising, concurred in the judgment.

THE COURT sent the cause to the Long Roll, to give the parties an opportunity of settling, if so advised.

MRS ALICE BURNETT, Pursuer (Respondent).—Mackay—Sym.
CHARLES JOHN BURNETT AND OTHERS (Miss Burnett's Trustees), Defenders (Reclaimers).—C. J. Guthrie—Craigie.

Succession—Testament—Construction—Accretion of liferent.—In her trust settlement a testator appointed her trustees to pay over the yearly interest of the residue of her estate to her three brothers, Charles, George, and Stuart, equally among them, and to the survivors and survivor of them, and at the death of the survivor to divide the residue among three of her nieces. In a codicil, upon the narrative that George, one of the brothers, had died since the date of the settlement, she provided,—“I hereby recall the bequest made by me therein to George of a share of the residue of my estate, being one-third thereof, and ordain my trustees to pay over the said share which would have fallen to him had he not so predeceased me to his widow.” The testatrix died in 1890, and her brother Stuart died in 1893.

In an action raised by George's widow against the trustees, held (assuming that by share of residue the testator meant share of income of residue) that the pursuer was entitled not only to the third share of income, but also to one half of Stuart's share to which under the settlement her husband would have been entitled.

MISS MARY ERSKINE BURNETT, residing at Balbithan House, Aberdeen-shire, died on 25th April 1890, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 3d August 1883, in which, after providing for payment of debts and certain legacies, she appointed her trustees “to pay over the yearly interest or profits arising on the whole remainder and residue of my estate . . . to my brothers, Charles John Burnett, George Burnett, and Stuart Mowbray Burnett, equally among them, and share and share alike, and to the survivors and survivor of them . . . but for their liferent use alienably.”

1st Division.
Ld. Kyllachy.

On the death of the survivor of the liferenters the testatrix directed the trustees to divide the residue among her three nieces.

By codicil, dated 12th March 1890, Miss Burnett, inter alia, provided,—“And considering that since the date of my said trust-settlement my said brother George has died, I do hereby recall the bequest made by me therein to him of a share of the residue of my estate, being one-third thereof, and ordain my trustees to pay over the said share which would have fallen to the said George Burnett, had he not so predeceased me, to Mrs Alice Stuart or Burnett, his widow: And with these alterations thereon I hereby confirm my said trust-disposition and settlement in every other respect.”

Miss Burnett died on 25th April 1890, and thereafter the trustees paid to each of Charles John Burnett, Stuart Mowbray Burnett, and Mrs Alice Burnett, one-third of the free yearly interest of the residue of the estate.

Stuart Mowbray Burnett died on 9th January 1893.

Mrs George Burnett, on 30th September 1893, raised an action against the trustees for declarator that, in virtue of the provisions of the settlement and codicil, she was entitled from and after the death of Stuart Mowbray Burnett to the yearly interest or profits arising on the residue of Miss Burnett's estate along with Charles John Burnett, equally between them during their joint lives, and to the whole of said yearly interest or profits in the event of her surviving him, and further, to have the defenders ordained to pay her the said yearly interest or profits yearly and share and share alike with Charles John Burnett during their joint lives, and the whole to the pursuer in the event of her surviving him.

Defences were lodged for the trustees, who maintained that Charles J. Burnett was entitled to two-thirds of the income, and that on his death, although the pursuer were alive, two-thirds of the residue would be payable to the fiars, who were not called.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) All parties not called. (3) On a sound construction of said trust-disposition and settlement and relative codicil the pursuer is only entitled to one-third of said yearly interest.

The pursuer subsequently by minute amended the summons by restricting the declaratory conclusion to a conclusion that from and after the death of Stuart M. Burnett she and Charles John Burnett were entitled equally to the yearly profits of the residue during their joint lives, and restricting the petitory conclusion in a similar way.

On 14th March 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, decerns, and ordains in terms of the conclusions of the summons, as amended in terms of minute No. 11 of process: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses: Allows an account to be lodged, and remits," &c.*

The trustees reclaimed, and argued;—The language of the codicil was inconsistent with the pursuer's contention. The testatrix had obviously used the words of recall in order to emphasise the fact that she desired that the pursuer should only receive what was given her by the codicil, i.e., one-third of the interest of the residue. Where either by express provision or by the operation of the conditio si sine liberis children of a predeceasing legatee took their parent's share, that share was held not to cover accreting shares in which the parent would have been entitled to participate had he survived.¹

Argued for the pursuer;—On a sound construction of the codicil the intention of the testatrix was to recall the provision in favour of George, and to substitute the pursuer in his place. The words "being one-third thereof" applied to the bequest which the testator was clearing out of the

* "OPINION.—In this case I think I may hold that the restriction of the pursuer's summons obviates sufficiently the plea that all parties are not called. There can now be no judgment except with respect to the income of the fund during the survivance of the defender, Mr Charles John Burnett, and as to that income the only persons interested are the pursuer and Mr Burnett himself.

" . . . I think the question is not without difficulty; but it is, after all, simply a question as to the truster's intention, and I have come to the conclusion that according to the just construction of the codicil of 12th March 1890, the pursuer, Mrs Burnett, is entitled to be put exactly in the same position as her husband would have held if he had survived. That is to say, she takes up not only the original share, but also the accruing share to which, under the settlement, her husband would have succeeded.

"I do not think that much help is to be derived from the analogy of the law applicable to conditional institution of children either expressed or implied. The cases on that subject no doubt establish a rule of construction which, whether artificial or not, is well settled. But it is not a rule which I should desire to extend, and in the present case it is, I think, enough to say that the codicil under construction does not operate a conditional institution at all. The position just is that the original legatee having died before the testator, his widow, the pursuer, is by the codicil in question instituted in his place.

"Again, I am not disposed to lay the stress which the defenders do upon the language in which the codicil recalls the bequest to Mr George Burnett. No doubt the bequest recalled is described as 'the bequest made by me therein to him of the share of the residue of my estate, being one-third thereof.' But it is, I suppose, certain that the recall applied to the whole interest bequeathed to the deceased. Had Mr George Burnett been alive, and had it been desired in surviving to substitute his wife in his place, the language of the codicil would or might have been just the same, and yet I think it would in that case have been difficult to contend that Mrs Burnett should get the original share, while Mr Burnett should remain entitled to the share which accrued on his brother's death. I think therefore it is not doubtful that the words of recall cover the whole bequest, and that being so, it appears to me that the words which follow, and by which the pursuer is instituted, must be read in the same sense.

"I shall therefore grant decree in terms of the summons. . . ."

way, and accurately described the amount of residue which George Burnett would have taken, both at the date of the codicil and also at the date of the death of the testatrix. The only inaccuracy in the description lay in the fact that the third was capable of expanding according to circumstances into something larger. The language of the codicil was inaccurate in other respects, e.g., in describing the bequest as a "share of the residue," whereas it was only a share of the interest of the residue, but complete accuracy was not to be looked for in a loosely drawn deed of the kind. The inaccuracy of describing the pursuer's share as "one-third" did not amount to falsa demonstratio so much as to imperfect description, but even if it did, the Court would give effect to the obvious meaning of the testator.¹

Burnett v.
Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the Lord Ordinary is right. The words of recall, which are somewhat superfluously introduced, must be read as relating to what follows, but the words of bequest are contained in the words "I ordain my trustees to pay over the said share which would have fallen to the said George Burnett, had he not predeceased me, to Mrs Alice Stuart or Burnett, his widow."

In the first place, I think Mr Mackay is right in saying that the words which purport to be a recall of the prior bequest import a total recall,—that is to say, the theory on which this lady finds it necessary to recall the provision made in the settlement is that she wants to clear the ground of the bequest to her brother George Burnett. Then it is to be observed that the thing recalled is somewhat loosely described as "a share of the residue" instead of "a share of the income of the residue," and that prepares one for the rest of the codicil not being expressed with complete accuracy of definition. Then we find that the testatrix, dealing with the bequest to her brother George of a share of the residue, puts in the words "being one-third thereof." I think the argument of Mr Mackay is sound, that these words are merely descriptive of the right which the testatrix was clearing out of the way, and it is to be noted that at the time when she was writing, and at the date of her decease, the amount quite accurately described the amount of George's share, because the decease of the other brother had not then taken place, and George's share was therefore one-third.

When, then, we go over the various points in the description of this bequest, it appears to me that the sound view is that the testatrix, having in mind and dealing with the bequest made to her brother George, which at the time was a bequest of one-third of the yearly interest of the residue, gives that to his widow. I do not think it necessary to say that the words are inaccurate—they are rather inexhaustive, but it appears to me sufficiently clear that the gift to George Burnett's widow is made to square with the lapsed gift to her deceased husband.

As regards the plea of "all parties not called," the limitation in the summons makes it impossible that our judgment should be res judicata against the testator's nieces.

LORD ADAM.—The language of this codicil is inaccurate, and requires construction. In the first place, the testatrix says that she recalls the bequest

No. 204. made to her brother George, and that is an inaccurate way of speaking, because the bequest to her brother had lapsed, and a lapsed bequest requires no recall. Then she describes the bequest to George as a share of the residue, and that is, strictly speaking, inaccurate, because it is not a share of the residue with which she is really dealing, but a share of the revenue of the residue.

July 18, 1894.
Burnett v.
Burnett's
Trustees.

All this shews that the words of bequest must receive construction, and I do not entertain any doubt that the intention of the testatrix was just to substitute the wife for the husband. When she says that in consideration of her brother George's death she recalls the bequest made to him, I have no doubt that she intends to deal with the lapsed bequest and nothing else, and having so dealt with it she ordains her trustees—leaving out the words “being one-third thereof”—to pay over the said share, which was in fact a third of the yearly interest of the residue with its incidents,—that is to say, its capacity for becoming more. At the date of the codicil and the death of the testatrix it was a third.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree substantially in the views expressed by your Lordships, but although it is immaterial I wish to say that I am not sure that I concur with the observation made by Lord Adam that the testatrix is inaccurate in saying that she recalls the bequest which she had previously made. If there was any inaccuracy it was only in using the equivalent word “recall” in place of the word “revoke,” because I think that when in consequence of the death of one of the original objects of a testator's bounty it is desired to put some other person in his place, it is quite correct conveyancing, and conduces to clearness, to begin by saying, “I revoke the bequest.” It has this advantage, that however expressed, it always corrects the testamentary bequest by stating what part of it has been displaced in order to make room for the bequest which the testator is about to bring in.

I agree in other respects that this codicil is not strictly accurate in its language. “A share of the residue” is not what is given, and this cannot be said to be merely an abbreviated mode of dealing with a share given to the mother in liferent and the family in fee, because that is not the scheme of the provision. So we begin with a codicil which is not expressed in strictly accurate terms. But if it had provided simply that the liferent share intended for the brother of the testatrix should go to his widow, or had bequeathed to the widow “the liferent of a third of the residue given to my brother George,” I would have held without difficulty that no right of accretion was carried by a bequest in these terms.

My first impression of this case differed from the view taken by the Lord Ordinary, but my difficulty has been entirely removed by considering, first, what was pointed out by Lord Kinnear during the discussion, that the reference to the share given to George as a third was descriptive of the interest which he would have taken as at the date of the codicil; and second, that the bequest does not stop there, but goes on,—“I ordain my trustees to pay over the said share which would have fallen to the said George Burnett, had he not so predeceased me,” to his widow. These are very comprehensive words, and although it is true, as is pointed out by the Lord Ordinary, that in some cases a bequest to children of the share which their parent would have taken has been held not to cover accreting shares in which the parent would have participated, that has been because the general scheme of disposition otherwise shewed that such was not the intention of the testator. In the present case the words are adequate to include the whole right and interest which George Burnett would have taken had he survived. No. 204.

LORD KINNEAR.—I also agree with the Lord Ordinary for the reasons his Lordship has given, and for the further reasons which your Lordships have added. Burnett v. Burnett's Trustees.

Commissioners of the Caledonian Canal v. County Councils of Inverness and Argyll.

Company—Railways and Canals—Whether “company” includes commissioners—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 91), secs. 20 and 21.—Section 21 of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854, enacts that “The Assessor of Railways and Canals under this Act shall, on or before . . . inquire into and fix in cumulo the yearly rent and value in terms of this Act of all lands and heritages in Scotland belonging to or leased by each railway and canal company, and forming part of its undertaking.”

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling) that the words “canal company” in the section applied to a body of statutory commissioners who were charged with the administration of a canal when the Act was passed.

ON 29th January 1894 the Commissioners of the Caledonian Canal, incorporated by Act 11 and 12 Vict. c. 54, entitled “an Act for incorporating the Commissioners of the Caledonian Canal, and for vesting the Crinan Canal in the said Commissioners,” brought an action against the County Councils of Argyllshire and Inverness-shire, inter alia, for declarator that the two canals formed part of one undertaking within the sense and meaning of section 21 of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854* (17 and 18 Vict. c. 91), and fell to be valued and assessed as one subject. 1st Division. Lord Stormonth-Darling.

The pursuers averred that in 1848 the Caledonian and Crinan Canals were vested in them for purposes of administration and management by the incorporating Act, and subsequently by the Act 23 and 24 Vict. c. 46, and that from 1848 down to the present time the two canals had been managed by them as one undertaking.

The comparing defenders, the County Council of Argyllshire, denied that the two canals formed one undertaking, and averred that the pursuers were neither a railway nor canal company within the meaning of the 21st section of the Act of 1854, their powers quoad the Crinan Canal, being merely administrative. The canal, therefore, fell to be assessed as part of the county, and not under section 21 of the Act.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The pursuers being neither a July 18, 1894. Commissioners of the Caledonian Canal v. County Council of Inverness and Argyll.

(4) The canals in question being separate undertakings in the sense and for the purposes of the Valuation Acts, these defenders should be assoltized from the declaratory conclusions of the summons.

On 23d June the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) assoltized the comparing defenders from the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—The Commissioners of the Caledonian Canal desire by this action to establish that the Caledonian Canal and the Crinan Canal, which are vested in them for public purposes, both form part of their undertaking within the sense and meaning of section 21 of the Valuation Act of 1854, and ought to be valued and assessed as one subject, with the result that the valuation would be nil, the loss on the Caledonian Canal more than extinguishing the profit on the Crinan Canal.

"The defenders dispute the proposition that the two canals form one undertaking, but they state another plea which requires to be considered ante omnia, because it strikes at the root of the declaratory conclusions of the summons. It is to the effect that the 21st section of the Valuation Act applies only to lands and heritages belonging to or leased by railway and canal companies, and that the pursuers are neither the one nor the other.

"I have given anxious consideration to this plea, because, if well founded, it unsettles the practice, which has long prevailed, of having these two canals valued by the Assessor of Railways and Canals, and also because one cannot help seeing that it must lead to highly inconvenient consequences. If a subject like a canal, running through a succession of assessment areas, is to be valued by the ordinary assessor of the county, instead of by the Assessor of Railways and Canals, the valuation must be made without the aid of all those elaborate provisions of the Act of 1854, and amending statutes, which have been enacted for the guidance of the special officer. The inconvenience in this particular case is somewhat diminished by the fact that the Caledonian Canal is situated wholly in the county of Inverness, and the Crinan Canal wholly in the county of Argyll. But there are other cases where the inconvenience would be very great. By section 23 of the statute water companies and gas companies, and any other companies having continuous lands and heritages, liable to be assessed in more than one parish, county, or burgh, may elect to have their assessment made by the Assessor of Railways and Canals, and I was informed at the debate that this privilege had been largely taken advantage of. Now, if water-works, like the Glasgow Water-works, which run through several counties, cannot be assessed in this way because they happen to be vested in commissioners and not in a company, it is obvious that they cannot get the benefit of the uniform mode of valuation provided for other undertakings of a similar description, and that the assessors of each of the counties through which they pass may all differ as to the proper mode of valuation. Moreover it is plain that the reason for having a special officer and a special mode of valuation for all such undertakings had nothing to do with the kind of body in which they happened to be vested, but arose entirely from their having a continuous line of property running through a succession of assessment areas. I have therefore had every disposition to come to the conclusion that Canal Commissioners might be held to be included under the phrase 'Canal Companies.'

"I have, however, found myself unable to come to that conclusion, consistently with what I believe to be the true principles applicable to the construction of statutes. The pursuers are not a company in any legal sense. They were in existence as a body of statutory commissioners when the Act of 1854 was passed. The Act omitted to notice them, and I must conclude either that the omission was intentional, or that it was accidental. I believe that it must have been accidental; but even in that case it is, I think, beyond the function of a Court of law to supply the omission. That must be done by the Legislature itself.

"A question not unlike the present arose in England in 1870, on a construc-

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—It had been decided in 1872¹ No. 205. that these canals were liable to assessment. That being so they fell to be assessed by the special officer appointed by the 21st section of the Act of 1854. The Lord Ordinary had needlessly narrowed the meaning of the word “company” as occurring in that section. It was not confined to a joint stock company engaged in trade, but must be construed in its largest ordinary or popular sense as an association of persons concerned in some common object—a definition which would include a body of commissioners such as the pursuers.²

July 18, 1894.
Commissioners of the Caledonian Canal v. County Council of Inverness and Argyll.

Argued for the defenders;—The Lord Ordinary’s construction of the word “company” was right. It must be construed in its ordinary technical and legal sense as an association engaged in trade. This definition is not applicable to the pursuers, who were merely administrators, and could not make gain out of the undertaking.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has lucidly set out the considerations which predisposed him to come to the conclusion that Canal Commissioners may be held to be included in the phrase “canal companies.” Those are strong considerations, and I think they are well founded both in the facts which they narrate and the principle which they presume. But his Lordship has felt himself constrained to decide in an opposite sense owing to the limited interpretation which he places on the word “companies.”

Now, it is to be observed, that we are considering an Act passed in the year 1854, and the question we have to determine is, what is meant not by the word “companies” now, but by the words “canal companies,” and I would interpolate “in Scotland, in 1854.” To take the word “company” by itself, I think it will be found that that word has acquired a rather more limited interpretation now than it possessed forty years ago. But Mr Stewart very frankly admitted that if you are to take the word “company” even now in the ordinary or popular sense, that would include such a body as “commissioners.”

I think that is a perfectly fair and accurate concession. I think that the word “companies,” as ordinarily used, does not now, and did not then, limit the mind of the reader to companies formed for trading purposes, but includes tion of section 55 of the Local Government Act of 1858, which enacts that the occupier of any land used only as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance shall be assessed in the proportion of one-fourth part only of its net annual value. The question was whether this provision could be construed so as to cover the case of a railway originally constructed without any Parliamentary powers, and afterwards sold to a railway company under an Act of Parliament, and used for public traffic under the general Railway Statutes. The Court of Queen’s Bench decided that it could not, and Lord Chief-Justice Cockburn, in giving judgment, said,—‘I cannot see my way to putting such a construction upon section 55 as would meet the equity of the case, and include a railway like the present, though I have no doubt the Legislature would have drawn the clause so as to embrace the present case, had such a case been present to their minds.’ The reference is North-Eastern Railway Company v. Leadgate Local Board, L. R., 5 Q. B. 157.

“It follows that the Crinan Canal must, in my opinion, be valued by the ordinary Assessor for Argyllshire, and that the defenders are entitled to absolver.”

any organisation of men who are concerned in some common purpose. But then, as I have said, we need to consider what was meant by the Legislature in 1854 by "canal companies," and as the Act applies to Scotland alone, by "canal companies in Scotland." Now, we are told that at that date there were five canals in Scotland. Of these, two were those now in question—the Caledonian and Crinan Canals—and these two large undertakings were in the hands of those self-same Commissioners incorporated in 1848. The other canals can hardly be said to compare, although three in number, in importance with the two which I have named. That leads us to this curious result that if the argument of the respondents in this reclaiming note be right, the Legislature intended, when prescribing the mode of valuation and the officer to be engaged in the valuation of canals, to have made this distinction, that some of the canals were to go to the Assessor of Railways and Canals, and other canals were to remain under the County Assessor.

It had been found that there were manifest inconveniences in the original way of getting canals valued, and those inconveniences applied quite as much to canals in the hands of commissioners as to canals in the hands of companies. Now, the difference in the proprietorship between those two is apparently irrelevant to the considerations which made a change in 1854 expedient and advisable. Therefore I think that it is an exceedingly hard contention which is urged upon us by the respondents in the reclaiming note, that the Legislature in taking the word "companies" deliberately intended to make that artificial and unreasonable distinction between the two bodies.

It was suggested as a last resort by Mr Stewart that it might be intended to confer a favour upon canals as trading companies by transferring the valuation to the Assessor of Railways and Canals. That there should be any favour in that operation is not manifest, and does not appear on the face of the Act of Parliament. And what is more, I am at a loss to conceive why undertakings vested in the hands of commissioners should be put to a disadvantage over undertakings vested in the hands of trading companies. In short, to assign any reasonable ground to the limitation which is proposed to be effected seems to me entirely to fail. Then it is said, "Oh, but we are not to enlarge an exception." I do not think that any principle of that kind applies to this case; so far as can be discovered it is the nature of the undertaking itself which led to a change in the mode of valuation, and it is rather to create an exception to say that canals held by statutory commissioners are not to be valued in the same way as other canals. Therefore, all these things considered, it seems to me that the argument of the respondents fails, and that there is no reason to confine the word "companies" to that very narrow and artificial limitation. I am glad to say that in reversing the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor we are giving effect to the conclusion which his Lordship would fain have arrived at, and it seems to me to be the one most consonant with the manifest purpose of the Act and also with its real object.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The question arises under the 21st section of the Valuation Act of 1854, which provides that the Assessor shall inquire into and fix the rate or value of all lands and heritages in Scotland belonging to railway and canal companies. It is argued to us—and the view is supported by the Lord Ordinary—that these words "belonging" to a railway or "canal company" must be read in a restricted and limited sense. It is said No. 205.

 that this applies only to railways and canals which are the property of companies in the sense of being engaged in trade, but not to canals or railways which are vested in the hands of commissioners. The distinction between the two is no doubt very wide, because, as was pointed out, commissioners holding for a public purpose have no personal interest in what is called the stock, and make no gain. And on the other hand there are companies which, of course, exist wholly for gain.

July 18, 1894.
 Commissioners of the Caledonian
 Canal v.
 County Councils of Inverness and Argyll.

Now, we know of our own knowledge, and it has been brought out at the bar, that ever since the passing of the Valuation Act of 1854 canals, railways, water-works, and all those undertakings which are now vested in statutory commissioners, have all been treated as falling under the provisions of the Act. It was never hinted that the one being vested in directors and the other in commissioners would make any distinction. I can see no reason why those principles of valuation which are referred to as being proper and effective in the case of railways and canals belonging to private companies should not equally be applied to railways and canals when they are in the hands of commissioners. There is no suggestion made why there should be a distinction drawn in those two cases. Now, it is in that state of circumstances that we come to consider this question, and with this further admission, as your Lordship pointed out, and which I think is a very proper admission, that the word "company" in its ordinary and popular sense is quite sufficient to include commissioners as well as directors of other companies. Why should not we give effect to that? I agree with your Lordship that we should, and therefore I think that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled.

LORD M'LAREN.—This question arises in an action brought for the purpose of determining whether the undertaking of the Caledonian and Crinan Canals ought to be valued separately or as one subject. A question has been raised by the County Council of Argyllshire to the effect that the valuation of these public undertakings does not fall within the series of clauses beginning at the 20th of the Lands Valuation Statute of 1854.

The ground of the objection is, that according to the respondents' contention the Commissioners in whom are vested the management of these undertakings do not constitute a company in the sense of the Act.

It is important to notice, I think, that in the first and leading clause, the 20th, the word "company" is only used as part of the description of the undertaking, because the clause begins "in order to the making up of the valuation-rolls of lands and heritages in Scotland belonging to or leased by railway and canal companies." That is a familiar way of describing not only the whole railways and canals in Scotland, but the whole of the undertakings associated with these subjects.

Now, I agree with your Lordship that the word "companies" is to be taken in the ordinary and not in a technical meaning. In its most extended meaning the word "company" is an association of persons for a lawful purpose; and it has also received a more restricted meaning by which is understood a body incorporated by statute for trading purposes. But according to the usage in Scotland there does not seem to be any fixed term for describing an association of persons for trading or public purposes. In the case of professions we have the association of professional persons variously described as faculties, societies, and colleges, these just being the English translation of the well-known terms of description of corporations and private societies; and the usage of the country admitting a varied phraseology in the description intended to be taken by companies, whether in trade or not in trade.

I think it is impossible, consistently with any sound reading or construction, to confine the meaning of this word "company" to trading companies, when we see that such a limited meaning is not consistent with the purposes expressed in the clauses establishing a new form of valuation of subjects which extend over more than one parish or county.

Then the meaning of a word in an Act of Parliament, I think, must be fixed just like the meaning of a word in a contract, or in any other written instrument which the Court may be called upon to construe. One of the best guides in ascertaining the meaning is the contemporary use by persons interested in such undertakings when the Act was passed, the word used being a word of popular signification. I should think that the uniform practice extending over a period of more than forty years under which these public undertakings not carried on for profit had been valued by the Assessor of Railways and Canals is very strong evidence of the meaning attributable to the words at the time when the Act was passed. I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the existing method of valuation ought not to be disturbed.

I think the Lord Ordinary has stated the construction in a way to which no exception can be taken; but his Lordship has not given sufficient weight to the practice, or rather to the history of the past usage following upon the Act.

LORD KINNAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, repelled the third plea for the defenders, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed in the cause.

Soutar v.
Carrie.

CHARLES SOUTAR, Petitioner.—Strachan.
JAMES CARRIE, Respondent.—Findlay.

Parent and Child—Custody—Repayment of costs of upbringing of child—Custody of Children Act, 1891 (54 Vict. c. 3), sec. 2.—The Custody of Children Act, 1891, sec. 2, enacts that "if at the time of the application for a writ or order for the production of the child the child is being brought up by another person . . . the Court may in its discretion, if it orders the child to be given up to the parent, further order that the parent shall pay to such person . . . the whole of the costs properly incurred in bringing up the child, or such portion thereof as shall seem to the Court to be just and reasonable, having regard to the circumstances of the case."

In a petition by a father for the custody of his daughter, six years of age, the respondent, the child's maternal grandfather, stated that he had brought up the child from its birth, and that he was willing to deliver up the child on payment of £85, which he had expended on its aliment.

In pronouncing an order for delivery of the child the Court, considering that the petitioner was in humble circumstances, and that the respondent had failed to shew that a larger sum was reasonable, ordained the petitioner to pay to the respondent £15, in monthly payments of 5s.

IN December 1893 Charles Soutar, bootlicker, Edinburgh, presented a petition to the Court for the custody of his daughter, Annie Carrie Soutar, about six years of age, then living with James Carrie, dairyman, Arbroath, her maternal grandfather. No. 206.
July 19, 1894.
Soutar v.
Carrie.

James Carrie lodged answers, in which he, inter alia, stated that the child had been born in his house, and had been brought up by him; that the child was extremely delicate, and had required exceptional care and treatment, and that the sum expended by him on her maintenance exceeded £85. He therefore craved that he should not be called upon to deliver up the child until he had received payment from the petitioner of the outlay expended by him, or that at anyrate the order of delivery should be made conditional on payment or consignment of the amount of his claim. 1ST DIVISION.

It was explained at the bar that the petitioner was a man of limited means, but that he was willing to pay £15 in instalments of 5s. a-month if the petition were granted.

The respondent was unable to state particularly how the sum of £85 had been expended.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The section assumes that, where an order is made for payment, an order for delivery of the child to its natural guardian is being pronounced at the same time.

The respondent asks us to order payment of £85, and he is met by an offer of £15 to be paid in instalments of 5s. a-month.

We have not got the material here, and the respondent is unable to give us material enabling us to arrive at a decision of what larger sum would be reasonable. We are entitled to take into account the position and income of the person who is called upon to make payment, and in the circumstances I think we should pronounce an order for payment of £15, not because that is the sum offered, but because the respondent has not supplied us with anything tangible or definite leading us to arrive at a different conclusion.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD MACLAREN.—I do not read the section of the Act as providing that the whole sum expended in aliment must necessarily be given, but that a sum should be awarded as compensation to the person deprived of the custody of the child. The circumstances and position of the person liable to make the payment should be taken into account, and I agree with your Lordship as to the amount, and on the same ground, namely, that nothing has been said shewing that a larger sum ought to be awarded than the sum offered.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Grant the prayer of the petition: Find that the petitioner is entitled to the custody of Annie Carrie Soutar, the child of the marriage between him and Annie Carrie mentioned in the petition, and decern and ordain James Carrie, dairyman, 66 Abbey Park, Arbroath, forthwith to deliver up the said child to the petitioner or to those having his authority, and further decern and ordain the petitioner to pay to the respondent the said James Carrie the sum of £15 sterling at the rate of 5s. per month until the sum of £15 shall have been paid."

Dowie v.
Hagart.

Judicial Factor—Averments of facility and undue influence—Compelency—Marriage-contract—Provisions to children.—A petition for the appointment of a judicial factor on the estate of a widow eighty-six years of age was presented by all her children, except her youngest son. The petitioners stated that upon a sound construction of their parents' marriage-contract and other deeds the children of the marriage were entitled to an equal share of their mother's estate upon her death, and that their mother was not entitled to defeat their rights by gratuitous alienation; that their mother owing to her great age and impaired health was facile and unable to resist the importunities of her youngest son, and that in consequence she had made advances to him largely in excess of his just share, and that the estate was in danger of being wholly dissipated by her. They did not aver that she was incapable of managing her affairs apart from undue influence.

The widow lodged answers, in which she denied the averments as to her health and facility and as to the conduct of her youngest son, and stated that her estate belonged to her absolutely, and that she was entitled to dispose of it as she pleased.

The Court dismissed the petition in respect (1) that it was not clear upon the deeds what the rights of the petitioners were, and that the petition was not an appropriate process for their ascertainment; and (2) that the other averments as to the widow's liability to undue influence were not relevant to support an application for the appointment of a judicial factor.

Observations (per Lord M'Laren) on the circumstances in which the Court would appoint a judicial factor.

Observations (per Lord M'Laren and Lord Kinnear) upon the effect of a conveyance in a marriage-contract of property which was to belong to one of the spouses at the date of his or her death, and upon Wyllie's Trustees v. Boyd, July 10, 1891, 18 R. 1121.

1ST DIVISION.

ON 21st June 1894 a petition was presented for the sequestration of the estates of the deceased Mr James Valentine Hagart and of his widow, Mrs Amelia Straton or Valentine Hagart, and for the appointment of a judicial factor thereon.

The petition was presented by Mrs Amelia Dowie and others, the whole children of the marriage of Mr and Mrs Hagart with the exception of Francis the youngest son.

The petitioners stated that Mr Hagart died on 14th August 1869, and that his trustees, including Mrs Hagart, proceeded to administer his estate, which consisted, inter alia, of improvement expenditure on the entailed estate of Glendelvine belonging to Mrs Hagart; that this estate was subsequently disentailed (and afterwards sold), with consent of the eldest son John, now deceased, and of the two next heirs, two of the petitioners, who agreed to accept much less than the actuarial value of their interests on condition that the equal division of the father's and mother's estates among the family, provided for by the marriage-contract and by their father and mother's mutual settlement, should be fixed and irrevocable; that in consequence of this agreement it became unnecessary to separate the two estates. "The whole has been treated as one joint estate, and managed as such, and Mrs Hagart has enjoyed the whole income, Mr Hagart's trust being practically allowed to remain in abeyance."

The petitioners further averred (art. 11) that upon a just construction of their parents' marriage-contract and of their mutual settlement of 1861 the whole children of the marriage had a jus crediti in the estate of their father to the effect of entitling them or their representatives to receive payment of the capital thereof in equal shares upon the death of their mother, subject only to her proper liferent. Further, that upon a sound construction of these deeds,* et separatim, in respect of the transaction and agreement with reference to Glendelvine, the whole children "had and have a right to receive at the death of their mother, in equal shares, the capital of her estate, and Mrs Hagart was and is not entitled to alienate or dissipate the said capital by gratuitous gifts inter vivos, and particularly by gratuitous gifts inter vivos to one of her said children, in fraud of the said deeds and of the said transaction and agreement, to the prejudice of the petitioners, as the other members of her family."

Dowie v. Hagart.

The petitioners further stated (art. 13) that their mother was over eighty-six years of age; that her son Francis "has for some years past, and at all events from 1888 onwards, acquired a dominating influence over his aged mother, which she has been and is quite unable to resist, and which he has repeatedly exercised to his own pecuniary advantage. Owing to her great age and impaired health she is and has been, during the said period, facile in mind and completely subservient to the will of her said son, and unable to resist his importunity, or to exercise an independent will or judgment when he is present, or in regard to affairs in which he is concerned. . . . Mrs Hagart's said weakness and facility, and the domination and ascendancy of her said son over the mind and will of his mother, have rendered her incapable, and will in the future render her still more incapable of resisting his demands, however exorbitant, unjust, and unreasonable."

The petitioners further stated that Francis had already received from his mother sums of money largely in excess of the amount to which his just share could possibly amount.

Answers were lodged for Mrs Hagart, in which she denied the material averments in the petition. The last article was as follows:—"The respondent submits that the present application is incompetent, and that the statements made in support of it are entirely irrelevant. She does not claim to be entitled to expend any part of the estate which belonged to her deceased husband; but in point of fact no such estate exists, with the exception possibly of the house, which she is entitled to enjoy in liferent under contractual provision in her contract of marriage. As regards her own estate, the respondent claims that she cannot be deprived of her right to administer and to dispose of same in the manner which she considers best. She therefore submits that the petition should be refused."

Argued for the petitioners;—Although there was no precedent for the present proceedings, the petitioners' interests must, in the peculiar circumstances averred, be in some way protected, and the appointment craved was within the powers of the Court in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction. (1) If it could be shewn that by the marriage-contract, mutual disposition, and subsequent transactions, Mrs Hagart had bound herself to an equal division of her estate among her children at her death, then it seemed to follow that she could be restrained from defeating her obligation by making inter vivos gifts to her youngest son to the dis-

* By the marriage-contract Mrs Hagart assigned, disposed, conveyed, and made over to and in favour of Mr Hagart in liferent, in the event of his surviving her, and to the child or children of the marriage, whom failing, to her own nearest heirs and assignees in fee, All and Sundry other lands and heritages, debts, sums of money, heritable and moveable, real and personal, and all goods and gear of whatever denomination, including household furniture and plenishing that might belong to her at the time of her death.

No. 207. July 19, 1894. Dowie v. Hagart. appointment of the just expectations of her other children. The terms of her obligation under the marriage-contract were that she should at her death divide among her whole children equally, share and share alike, such estate as might belong to her at the time of her death. Gifts inter vivos were in fraud of this obligation.¹ [LORD M'LAREN.—The cases of Buchanan's Trustees,² Macdonald,³ and Wyllie's Trustees,⁴ settle that where a parent has by marriage-contract settled the estate "then belonging or which might belong to him at the time of his death" upon his children, he is free to dispose of property acquired by him in the interval.] These cases would only seem to shew that marriage-contracts may be so worded as to admit of gratuitous alienation during marriage by a parent to a third party of property acquired during marriage. They did not support the view that a parent could, as in the present case, defeat by inter vivos gifts the rights of children who had a protected spes successionis in his estate. Lord Curriehill's dictum in *Champion's*⁵ case was not borne out by the authorities. Then again, the provisions in the marriage-contract here in the case of the wife were in marked contrast to those in the case of her husband. She had bound herself to equal division among her children without reservation of any power of appointment. In the disposition of 1861 the subject of her obligation was an equal division not only of what she might possess at her death, but of what then belonged to her. It bore to be revocable by either spouse quoad his or her estate, but it was a mutual deed, and the death of the husband barred the widow from revoking. She was also barred from interfering with the equal division of her estate at her death by the transactions and agreement when the estate of Glendelvine was sold. The petitioners were entitled to have her restrained from gratuitously alienating her estate, in which they had a jus crediti. (2) Apart from the deeds, they were entitled to the remedy sought upon their averments as to the respondent's facility and the dominating influence exercised over her by her son. The averments on this matter were relevant, and, if established, clearly entitled them to the remedy. There was no room for the appointment of a curator bonis. A person facile and subject to undue influence was not necessarily a person who could be cognosced or to whom a curator bonis could be appointed.⁶ It was not essential to establish general facility, or such as would amount to incapacity to manage one's own affairs, but only facility with regard to the particular matter which was under reduction, or with regard to the particular individual who was exercising a dominant influence.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The petitioners' averments were irrelevant. Under the deed founded on by them there was no jus crediti in her estate secured to them. There was nothing in the marriage-contract to deprive the respondent of her power of dealing with her own estate as she pleased. She was fiar now, and could act accordingly, although she was ultimately bound to leave such estate as happened to belong to her at her death in a particular way. A fiar could disregard a prohibition against alienation.¹ The mutual deed was testamentary, and she could defeat it by another deed if she chose.² The averments as to transactions with the petitioners were irrelevant. (2) The application was incompetent. It was not averred that the respondent's mental capacity was impaired by age, so that she was incapable of managing her own affairs, in which circumstances the proper remedy would have been the appointment of a curator bonis. There was no precedent for the appointment of a judicial factor in such circumstances.

No. 207.

Dowie v.
Hagart.

LORD ADAM.—This is a petition for the sequestration of the estates of the now deceased James Valentine Hagart and of Mrs Amelia Straton or Valentine Hagart, and for the appointment of a judicial factor to receive the income of these estates. The petitioners are the whole of the children and the representatives of the children of Mr and Mrs Hagart except one, the youngest son Francis David Valentine Hagart, and the respondent is Mrs Hagart herself. Now, the estates which it is sought to sequester, it will be observed, are two estates. The first mentioned is the estate of the late Mr James Valentine Hagart, and the second is the estate of Mrs Hagart herself. With reference to the latter of these two estates it will be observed that Mrs Hagart has all along—certainly from the death of her husband in 1866—been in the entire management and sole possession and disposal of the estate—that is to say, for some thirty odd years—and it is proposed that her estate should now de plano be sequestered, and the management and disposal thereof be taken out of her hands. The immediate grounds upon which this is sought are set forth in the 13th article of the petition. It is there said, stated shortly, that Mrs Hagart is a very old lady, now nearly eighty-seven years of age; that she is weak and facile and easily imposed upon; that her youngest son Francis is a man of loose and disorderly habits, and that taking advantage of the dominating influence which he has acquired over her, he has obtained from her, through threats, fraud, and misrepresentation, large sums of money, which large sums of money are, it is said, much more than would be his proper share of the estates of his father and mother, because these estates are to be equally divided among the children. That is the immediate ground for making this application.

Now, it will be observed that that proceeds upon the footing that, apart from her being tampered with, she is in a perfectly able and fit state of mind to manage and administer her own estate. For if she had not been so—if there had been any averment that she was unable from her great age or otherwise to properly manage and administer her estates, the proper remedy would not have been the remedy which is sought to be adopted here. The proper remedy would have been the appointment of a curator bonis to her, who would in that case have administered and managed the estate for her benefit, just as she had been managing and administering it for her own benefit in the past. There is

Hagart.

Now, I must say that I think that a petition for the appointment of a judicial factor in such circumstances would be altogether incompetent. No authority for such a proceeding was mentioned to us, and I know of none. But it is said that there are special circumstances in this case which would lead to a different conclusion. The circumstances and all the deeds which raised the question are set forth at length in this petition, but I need not go through them in detail, because the results of them as maintained by the petitioners are set forth and condensed in the 11th article of the petition. And what is there set forth is this—that, upon a just construction of the various deeds, which I need not particularise, the children were entitled “to receive payment of the capital of these estates in equal shares upon the death of their mother, and subject only to her proper liferent of the same. Further, that upon a sound construction of the said deeds, et separatim, in respect of the said transaction and agreement and of the actings of parties narrated in articles 8, 9, and 10 hereof, the whole children of the marriage or their representatives had and have a right to receive at the death of their mother, in equal shares, the capital of her said estate, and Mrs Hagart was and is not entitled to alienate or dissipate the said capital by gratuitous gifts inter vivos to one of her said children, in fraud of the said deeds and of the said transaction and agreement.” It is said that if we do not give this remedy there would be no other; because, if proper means were not to be used against Mrs Hagart disposing of her property to this son Francis, it might be dissipated and could not be recovered. That may be so, but I would point out to your Lordships that these averments on the part of the petitioners are denied on the part of the respondent. On the contrary, the respondent’s counsel maintains stoutly that she is now and has been during the whole of her life, as she was entitled to be, the sole and unlimited fiar of her own property, and accordingly that is the question which is raised upon the construction of these deeds. One of the parties says that Mrs Hagart is unlimited fiar, and would be entitled to act on that footing till the day of her death, and that the petitioners will be entitled to a share equal or otherwise after her death of their father and mother’s estates, and, as I have said, the opposite proposition is maintained on the other side. Now, if it had been clear upon these deeds that the petitioners were right in their construction, and had acted upon that footing, that would have been an important matter; but we heard a long argument upon the subject, and all I need say at present is that the position of Mrs Hagart and the rights of her children are by no means clear; they are anything but clear. Now, it appears to me that a proceeding of this kind and in this shape is not a proper proceeding for settling incidentally these important questions. I think we must look to the existing state of possession, because Mrs Hagart has for the last thirty years had undisturbed possession and management of her own estate, which has always been in her own possession, management, and administration, and I certainly see no reason whatever, upon the suggestions which have been made, and a sufficient consideration of the deeds which passed between the parties to this case, for saying that Mrs Hagart is to be in this manner ousted from the possession which she has so long retained. I do not think that there is any ground for disturbing her possession of the estate, and therefore I am of No. 207.

opinion that, so far as her estate is concerned, we should dismiss the petition.

But then, as your Lordships will see, there is the estate of her husband which July 19, 1894.
has been for thirty years and more mixed up and administered by her along with Dowie v.
her own. Her position in regard to it is not the same as in regard to her own. Hagart.
No doubt she has been in possession of it all along, but she is in possession of it apparently by the consent and with the approval of the beneficiaries of the estate, and of the trustees whom Mr Hagart appointed. In that way her position with reference to this estate is different from her position with reference to her own. I did not understand the petitioners to say that if we were to award sequestration of the whole estates, both hers and his, they would desire a separate appointment of a judicial factor over his estate. In fact I understood the contrary, and I also understood—but as to this I am not quite sure—that we were informed that the surviving trustees have already taken possession in order to vindicate that estate if necessary. In these circumstances I am of opinion that we should pronounce no order unless we are told that there is a separate ground for appointing a judicial factor on Mr Hagart's estate.

LORD M'LAREN.—The power which the Court has exercised, and as to which there is no longer any doubt, that of appointing factors for the administration of estates, is a very comprehensive power. It would certainly apply to any case where there is an estate for which no owner can be found, or where the owner is not capable of administering his estate, and it also applies to cases where there is disputed possession, or where the owners are unable to agree in regard to the administration of their estate, as sometimes happens in cases of joint ownership.
But whatever be the nature of the case which necessitates the appointment of a manager by the Court, it is always in its nature an interim appointment. I do not think that there is any case in which that power has been exercised unless upon grounds which would eventually entitle the party for whose benefit the appointment was made to a judgment in an ordinary action for vindicating the property. I do not say that there may not be cases where the Court would appoint a factor upon an estate which was subject to marriage-contract obligations.
We may suppose, for example, that a parent had bound himself by antenuptial marriage-contract to convey certain lands to trustees in order that they might take infetment in his lifetime, and thereby secure the estate to the heirs of the marriage in such a way as would prevent it being carried off by the parent's creditors.
If that obligation were unfulfilled, and if there was a danger of the estate being carried away or made over by gratuitous alienation, that would be a case where an application for sequestration would deserve the most favourable consideration, but the ground there would be that the children would have had a right by action in which they would eventually succeed, according to the hypothesis of the case, in compelling the parent to grant and deliver a conveyance to the trustees. But then in the present case, not only is there no obligation to infet trustees in the lifetime of either parent, but, so far as relates to Mrs Hagart's property, the subject of the obligation is only such estate as the lady might have at her death—whatever "might belong to her at the time of her death."

It was argued in support of the application that this was equivalent to a general conveyance of acquirenda, and I think it was felt by counsel that the establishment of that proposition was—if not a necessary element—at least a very important element—in their case. Now, it is of course possible that a question

No. 207. arising upon this destination may arise after the death of Mrs Hagart, and nothing that we say now could prejudice that question. But at the same time it is quite necessary, in considering whether a case has been made out for the appointment of a judicial factor, that we should also consider whether any grounds have been shewn in support of the position taken up by the children, that this is their property—a property to which they have a jus crediti. When the authorities are examined they appear to be all clear in the opposite direction. I may refer especially to the judgment delivered by Lord Kinnear in the case of Wyllie's Trustees v. Boyd, 18 R. 1121, in which this very point was distinctly raised, and where his Lordship, with the concurrence of the other members of the Court, laid down that under such a destination the children have right only to the property of the parent at the date of the marriage, and to whatever might be found to be his property at the date of his death, which of course implies that the parent is free to deal with acquirenda as he pleases during his lifetime. I may perhaps take occasion to qualify my adherence to that opinion upon another point—I refer to the sentence immediately preceding the one to which I have adverted, where Lord Kinnear, in distinguishing the destination that we were dealing with from a general conveyance of acquirenda, characterises the effect of a conveyance of acquirenda as if it deprived the father of all right of property and all power of control over property that might come to him during the intermediate period. Now, I think his Lordship there had in view the case of a conveyance to trustees which was intended to take effect during the subsistence of the marriage, and if so I assent to the proposition. But if the plan of the contract is that the obligation is not to be perfected by a conveyance until after the dissolution of the marriage, then I should hesitate to say that the father even in such a case could be deprived of the control and administration of his estate during his lifetime. I make this observation because it appears to me to be relevant to the other branch of the present case—that relating to Mr Hagart's conveyance—which is a conveyance in more comprehensive terms than that made by his wife. I think that the opinion of Lord Kinnear would support this proposition, that a parent who makes a general conveyance of acquirenda is liable to be restrained from acts of gratuitous alienation which would prejudice the heirs of the marriage, but that in all other respects, unless he has bound himself to infest trustees or to put them in possession of moveable subjects, he is the uncontrolled owner of his estate.

On the first question I am clearly of opinion that no ground has been shewn for appointing a judicial factor to administer Mrs Hagart's estate, because the children have not satisfied me that they have any right to the estate, or what is substantially the estate in question—the proceeds of the sale of the heritable property—until their parents' death.

Then as to Mr Hagart's estate, if there were here a body of trustees administering the estate, I should say that they ought to be left to carry out the will, there being no reason for displacing them. It is said that the trustees have never acted, and that with the consent of the family the two estates have been massed together and left in the hands of Mrs Hagart during her viduity. Well, if that has been done with the consent of the family—and I think that consent may be presumed—so long a period has elapsed without challenge of Mrs Hagart's right, that I do not think we ought to interfere in this summary mode to alter the existing state of possession.

We are given to understand that there is an action in dependence for constituting this trust, and it may be that if the trustees were to refuse to act it would be necessary to appoint a factor, but that case has not yet arisen. Therefore, I am of opinion that the application ought not to prevail even in regard to the father's estate, in which apparently the children have a certain immediate interest. I agree with Lord Adam that the petition ought to be dismissed.

Dowie v.
Hagart.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think it clear that we cannot deprive this lady of the administration of her estate upon the grounds alleged by the petitioners, which are personal to herself—that is to say, upon their statement that she is of great age and in impaired health, and ready to give way to the importunities of one of her children. If it had been said that she was incapable of managing her affairs in consequence of her age and infirmity, the proper course would have been to apply for the appointment of a curator bonis, by whom her affairs would be managed for her; but that is not alleged, and it was made very clear by the statement of counsel at the bar that they did not intend to aver that this lady was incapable of managing her own affairs in any such sense as would justify the appointment of a curator. Now, if she is capable of managing her affairs, then I am unable to see any ground which would justify the Court in depriving her of the administration of her estate. And I confess that I see very great difficulty, even if there were such grounds, in giving effect to the prayer of the petition for the appointment of a judicial factor, because I am unable to tell—and counsel were unable to tell me—what the powers and duties of a judicial factor would be. The duties of a curator bonis are perfectly well fixed, and they are founded upon the incapacity of his ward. The duty of a judicial factor who holds estate vested in somebody else for her, and I suppose for her only, except in so far as her children have certain greater or lesser rights of succession, would appear to me to be a very difficult thing for one to understand. If Mrs Hagart is entitled, notwithstanding the conditions of her marriage-contract, to dispose of her estate during her life at her pleasure, then I am unable to see how a judicial factor could prevent her from doing so, or could refuse to give effect to her conveyances if she granted them, unless the appointment were made on the footing of her being incapable of managing her own affairs for herself. I am therefore of opinion that that part of the petition cannot possibly be granted.

With reference to the other ground, I agree with Lord Adam and Lord M'Laren, and I do not think it necessary to add anything at all except with reference to what Lord M'Laren has said upon the case of Wyllie, and as to that I quite concur in his Lordship's observations. I do not think we intended in that case to lay down any rule in opposition to the settled rule that a conveyance—a general gift of acquirenda—in a marriage-contract would not deprive the husband of the power of administration during his life. The point which required attention in that case was the distinction between a conveyance of profits—of acquirenda—and an undertaking to give not everything that the husband might acquire or the wife might acquire during their life, but only what might be left at the time of his or her death. Therefore, I quite agree with what Lord M'Laren has said.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the petition.

Railway—Compulsory purchase—Omission to give notice to treat through mistake or inadvertency—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. cap. 19), sec. 117.—The 117th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, enacts, that if at any time after the promoters of the undertaking shall have entered upon any lands which they were authorised to purchase, any person should appear to be entitled to any estate, right, or interest in or charge affecting such lands which the promoters should, "through mistake or inadvertency," have failed or omitted duly to purchase, or to pay compensation for, then, whether the period allowed for the purchase of lands shall have expired or not, the promoters should be entitled to purchase such omitted estate, &c., the purchase-money to be settled by arbitration in like manner as if the promoters had purchased the omitted estate, &c., before entering upon the lands.

Held that this enactment did not apply to cases in which the promoters did not, prior to the expiry of the period allowed for compulsory purchase, intend to acquire the omitted estate, right, interest, or charge.

2d DIVISION.
Ld Stormonth-
Darling.

In January 1891 the Caledonian Railway Company, acting under the powers of the Acts 51 and 52 Vict. cap. xciv. (Glasgow Central Railway Act), and 52 Vict. cap. xii., gave notice to the trustee of the late Thomas Allan to treat for the compulsory purchase of two small pieces of ground at Maryhill, near Glasgow, for the purposes of their intended line. In the course of the negotiations for the purchase, but after the period allowed by the Acts for giving notice for compulsory purchase had expired, it came to the knowledge of the railway company that Allan's titles reserved to the superior "the whole coal, ironstone, freestone, and other metals and minerals" in the ground feued, with full power to the superiors to work the same, subject to certain rights in Allan of working the freestone not necessary to be here detailed. Accordingly, the conveyance by Allan's trustee to the company (which was dated 26th July 1892) bore that the mines, metals, and minerals were conveyed to the company "in so far and to such extent only" as the disponent himself had right to the same.

Thereafter, in December 1892, the superiors, the trustees of the late James Davidson, of Ruchill (upon whom the railway company had not served a notice to treat for the purchase of the minerals), brought an action against the railway company, concluding for declarator that they were sole proprietors of the whole coal, ironstone, freestone, and other metals or minerals in the lands taken, and that the defenders had no right therein, and for payment of £16,000 as damages for freestone alleged to have been removed by the railway company.

In defence the railway company maintained, on grounds not necessary to be here specified, that they were within their rights under the conveyance by Allan's trustee in taking such freestone as they had taken, and further, in January 1894, they obtained leave to amend their defences, by averring that if decree should be pronounced in terms of the declaratory conclusions, then the omission to serve a notice on the pursuers was occasioned by mistake or inadvertence on the part of the defenders, and that they were entitled, and intended, to take the minerals as an omitted interest under and in terms of the 117th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845,* and to pay compensation therefor as the same might be fixed by arbitration, in terms of the Lands Clauses and the Companies Clauses Consolidation Acts, 1845; and they therefore pleaded, inter alia, that, in the event of their being so entitled, the petitory conclusions of the summons were incompetent. No. 208.

The pursuers averred that the defenders did not omit to purchase the minerals through mistake or inadvertence, and pleaded, inter alia;—(8) The defenders not having omitted, through mistake or inadvertency, to purchase the rights and interests of the pursuers in the said freestone, and the powers of compulsory purchase conferred upon them by their statutes libelled having now expired, are not entitled to acquire the said freestone, or to have the pursuers' present claims against them in respect of having taken the same determined by arbitration under the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.

Davidson's
Trustees v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

A proof was allowed. The evidence shewed that freestone appeared to be the only metal or mineral in the lands. The defenders had excavated all the freestone above the authorised formation level of the line, but down to December 1893 they never intended to take and, except to a slight extent, had not in fact taken the freestone below the authorised formation level, their evidence regarding the freestone taken being in conformity with their original defence, that they were within their rights under the conveyance by Allan's trustee in taking all the freestone above the formation level, and so much below as was necessary to the proper construction of the line.

On 1st June 1894, the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced an interlocutor granting decree of declarator and finding that the defenders, under the 117th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, were entitled to purchase or pay compensation for the pursuers' estate, right, and interest, in the minerals in question, on the terms and in the manner set forth in the said section.*

sec. 117, enacts,—“If at any time after the promoters of the undertaking shall have entered upon any lands which under the provisions of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, they were authorised to purchase, and which shall be permanently required for the purposes of the special Act, any party shall appear to be entitled to any estate, right, or interest in or charge affecting such lands which the promoters of the undertaking shall, through mistake or inadvertency, have failed or omitted duly to purchase, or to pay compensation for, then, whether the period allowed for the purchase of lands shall have expired or not, the promoters of the undertaking shall remain in the undisturbed possession of such lands, provided within six months after notice of such estate, right, interest, or charge, in case the same shall not be disputed by the promoters of the undertaking, or in case the same shall be disputed, then, within six months after the right thereto shall have been finally established by law in favour of the party claiming the same, the promoters of the undertaking shall purchase, or pay compensation for the same . . . and such purchase-money or compensation shall be agreed on or awarded and paid in like manner as, according to the provisions of this Act, the same respectively would have been agreed on, awarded, or paid, in case the promoters of the undertaking had purchased such estate, right, interest, or charge before their entering upon such lands, or as near thereto as circumstances will admit.”

* “OPINION.— . . . The next question is, whether the defenders have brought themselves under the 117th section of the Lands Clauses Act. If so, they say on record that they are willing, and intend, to purchase, the pursuers' minerals (by which I understand they mean the whole minerals), and to pay compensation therefor, as the same may be ascertained in terms of the statutes.

“On that part of the case I am with the defenders. The purpose of the 117th section is to provide that when promoters have entered on lands which

The pursuers reclaimed, and at the hearing conceded that, with respect to the minerals above the authorised formation level, the rights of the parties fell to be settled by arbitration in terms of the statutes.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuers' counsel having stated that they are willing that any question which may be between the parties regarding the minerals above the authorised formation level of this line of railway may be reserved to be settled by arbitration, we are now in the position of having to deal solely with the question regarding the minerals under the authorised formation level. The railway company say that through inadvertence they did not include such minerals in their notices, and that they wish to get the benefit of the clause in the Act which provides for such cases of inadvertence. Now, I am unable to see that there has been any inadvertence here. I am unable to see that there is anything to shew that the railway company intended to take the minerals below the authorised formation level. Indeed in the course of the debate we were practically told that, so far from the company having any intention of taking the minerals, they have never taken them at all. That was part of their case as regards the minerals below formation level,—that if anything below the formation level has been taken it is something very trifling, and was taken solely because of the bad character of the strata at the particular point. There was thus no inadvertence, and the company's powers of taking are expired. Therefore the question now is, if they have taken any such minerals, how compensation for these minerals is to be decided. They had their rights under their notice to Allan, and the superior has his rights subject to Allan's rights, and subject to such rights on the part of the railway company as Allan gave them by transfer. Beyond that they got nothing. I think, therefore, that the proper course is to allow a proof in regard to the minerals below formation level.

they were authorised to take, and have discovered that there is some estate, right, or interest in such lands which by mistake or inadvertence they have omitted to purchase, they shall nevertheless remain in undisturbed possession, provided they purchase or pay compensation for the same within a prescribed time. The time varies according as they admit or dispute the estate, right, or interest so emerging. In the present case the defenders have disputed it, for they have maintained to the last that they themselves acquired the minerals (down to formation level) by their purchase of the surface. Still, the Act says they shall have the right of purchasing within six months after the right has been finally established by law. It seems to me that all the conditions are present which are required by the Act. The defenders had entered on the lands before they knew anything about the pursuers' interest in the minerals. They did not actually know till June 1892, when they examined the titles. They might, no doubt, have known two months earlier, because the titles were sent to them in April. But long before that earlier date they had begun to work the freestone, and that seems to me enough to let in the 117th section. . . . I do not quite understand why" the pursuers "resisted the defenders' case of 'mistake or inadvertency.' They cited two English cases—Martin, 1 Ch. App. 501, and Stretton, 5 Ch. App. 751, in which the plea of mistake was held not to have been made out. Martin's case, I confess, I do not follow, but Stretton's was a case of something very like fraud, because the company knew perfectly well before they entered on the lands that the claimant was proprietor of a portion of the land on which they were entering. It is therefore quite distinguishable from the present case, where the mistake was a perfectly honest one."

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am clearly of opinion that the railway company never manifested any intention, while their compulsory powers existed, of taking anything below the formation level, and consequently I think that there is no case of inadvertence under the 117th section. The result is that they must pay for the minerals below the formation level which they may have taken, and we must allow a proof upon that matter, and also of any facts necessary to shew the extent of the use they have made under their title.

A County Council having determined that a particular road should cease to be a highway, three ratepayers appealed to the Sheriff, pleading (1) that it was incompetent for the County Council to declare that the road should cease to be a highway in respect that it was part of a road which extended beyond the confines of the county; and (2) that if competent, the determination of the County Council was, in the circumstances, an injudicious exercise of their powers and one which would cause public inconvenience. A record having been made up, the Sheriff-substitute appointed parties to debate on the "preliminary pleas," and thereafter pronounced an interlocutor repelling the pleas in law for the pursuers and "dismissing" the action. The pursuers appealed

No. 209. to the Sheriff, who recalled the foregoing interlocutor and appointed the case to be heard by himself. The County Council then brought a reduction of the Sheriff's interlocutor.

July 19, 1894. County Council of Roxburgh v. Dalrymple's Trustees.

The Court (rev. the judgment of Lord Kyllachy) dismissed the action as incompetent, holding further that the Sheriff had acted within his powers in recalling the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor and appointing the cause to be heard before himself, in respect that the Sheriff-substitute had not disposed of the merits of the appeal from the determination of the County Council, and that the question of competency was in any event subject to appeal.

2d DIVISION.
I.d. Kyllachy.

ON 25th October 1892 the County Council of Roxburgh, at a general meeting, passed the following resolution:—"Declare, in virtue of the powers conferred by section 42 of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, that the following highway shall cease to be a highway within the meaning and for the purposes of the said Act, that is to say,—part of the road No. 21 on the list of highways for Melrose district, from where it crosses the railway bridge on to Gala Water Ford."*

On 7th November the trustees of James Dalrymple of Langlee, and two other ratepayers in the parish of Melrose, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Jedburgh against the County Council of Roxburgh, praying to have the defenders ordained to retain on their list of roads, highways, and bridges, the piece of road above mentioned, and restrained from declaring that it should cease to be a highway within the meaning of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878.

A condescendence and pleas in law were annexed to the petition, and the defenders lodged answers with a separate statement of facts and pleas in law, and a record was made up.

The pursuers averred that the piece of road in question was part of a road which was not wholly in the county of Roxburgh, and consequently not wholly within the defenders' jurisdiction, part being in the burgh of Galashiels and part in the county of Selkirk; that (cond. 5) the defenders had not complied with the requirements of sec. 42 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, in respect that they had not posted up notices on the doors of churches in parishes outwith the county of Roxburgh through which the road passed, and that the closing of the piece of road which the defenders proposed to close would cause much public inconvenience.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) Under the 42d section of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, when construed along with the other sections thereof, it being incompetent for the defenders, acting by themselves alone, to declare that the road in question shall cease to be a highway.

* The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 51), sec. 42, enacts that the road trustees may after certain procedure (including the affixing of notices on the door of each church in every parish, "in which any part of such . . . highway is situated,") declare "that any highway shall cease to be a highway within the meaning and for the purposes of this Act."

Sec. 43 enacts,—". . . The determination of the trustees under the preceding section shall be final, and not subject to review in any Court or in any process or proceeding whatsoever, unless any three ratepayers who shall be dissatisfied with such determination shall, within fourteen days after the date thereof, appeal to the Sheriff . . . who shall hear and determine the appeal in a summary way, and the decision of the Sheriff shall be final, and not subject to review, and the expenses of such appeal shall be in the discretion of the Sheriff. . . ."

By section 3 of the Act it is provided, inter alia, that "'Sheriff' shall include Sheriff-substitute."

The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 50), sec. 11, subsec. 2, transferred to the County Council of each county the whole powers and duties of the county road trustees.

the prayer of this petition should be granted. (2) They not having fulfilled the requirements of the said 42d section the prayer of this petition should be granted. (3) The pursuers, for the reasons stated in their condescendence, having good cause for being dissatisfied with the defenders' determination, the prayer of this petition should be granted.

The defenders denied that the closing of the road would cause public inconvenience, and pleaded;—(4) The defenders being vested with the sole management and control of the said road, and having acted in the proper exercise of their statutory powers as condescended on, are entitled to absolvitor. (6) The averments of the pursuers, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defenders are entitled to be assolizied.

On 15th December 1892 the Sheriff-substitute (Speirs) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Appoints parties' procurators to debate the case on the preliminary pleas."

Thereafter, having heard parties' procurators, and made avizandum, but without any further procedure, the Sheriff-substitute, on 23d January 1893, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in point of fact that the part of the road in question which the County Council of Roxburghshire desired to close as a highway, is entirely situated in the county of Roxburgh: Finds in point of law that the said County Council have no powers or jurisdiction without the county of Roxburgh, therefore repels the pleas in law for the pursuers, and dismisses the action: Finds the pursuers liable to the defenders in expenses; allows an account thereof to be given in; remits the same to the Auditor of Court to tax when lodged and report, and decerns."*

The pursuers appealed to the Sheriff (Hope), who, on 25th February

* "NOTE.—This is an action in which the Court is asked to prevent the County Council from closing that part of the byroad 'leading from the Railway Bridge to Gala Ford.' As has been already stated, this portion of the road is in the county of Roxburgh (the Gala being the boundary between that county and the county of Selkirk): The Roxburgh County Road Trust (and hence the County Council) have nothing to do with the continuation of this byroad on the right bank of the Gala; it is outside the confines of their jurisdiction; they cannot even order notices to be placed on the doors of the Parish Church at Galashiels as suggested (condescendence 5), and in my opinion are therefore perfectly entitled, under sections 42 and 43 of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, 'acting by themselves alone,' to declare that the road in question shall cease to be a highway (subject, of course, to the veto of the Sheriff). I have therefore repelled pleas in law Nos. 1 and 2 for the pursuers. With regard to the 3d plea in law, I think the pursuers have utterly failed to shew, by 'the reasons stated in the condescendence,' that there is any good cause for recalling the determination of the County Council. The truth is that the real objectors live in Selkirkshire and Galashiels, and it is for their benefit that the County Council of Roxburghshire are asked to spend their ratepayers' money. The defenders do not appear to have acted in a high-handed or capricious manner; the question has been thoroughly investigated by a local committee, afterwards under consideration of the County Council; and that council have come to the conclusion that the exigencies of the case do not justify them in spending more money on a road which was so damaged by a flood in September 1891 that an almost new roadway would be required. The County Council have not actually closed this road; and judging from their offer of £60 towards the proposed bridge, I have no doubt they would meet the Selkirkshire authorities in a friendly spirit; and if the latter really think the road is required they might reconstruct it themselves, and then ask the Roxburgh County Council to maintain it in proper order. It is not perhaps for me to suggest this solution of the difficulty; I will only add that I thoroughly concur with the determination arrived at by the defenders."

No. 209. 1893, pronounced an interlocutor appointing the parties to be heard, and on 10th March pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Sheriff, having considered the process, after hearing counsel on the pursuers' appeal, recalls the interlocutor of 23d January last; repels" certain "pleas in law for the defenders; and quoad ultra appoints the case to be heard by him on a day to be afterwards fixed, reserving the question of expenses."*

County
Council of Roxburgh v.
Dalrymple's
Trustees.

On 6th April 1893 the County Council of Roxburgh brought the present action against Dalrymple's trustees and the two other pursuers of the action in the Sheriff Court, and also against the Sheriff of Roxburghshire, concluding for reduction of the note of appeal, and of the Sheriff's two interlocutors of 25th February and 10th March following thereon.

The pursuers set forth the procedure in the Sheriff Court action and pleaded, inter alia;—(1) In virtue of the provisions of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act 1878, the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute [of 23d January 1893] was final, and not subject to review by the Sheriff-principal. (2) In respect that the Sheriff-principal had no jurisdiction, the said note of appeal, and his interlocutors thereon, are incompetent and inept, and decree of reduction thereof falls to be pronounced, as concluded for.

The defenders, other than the Sheriff of the county, lodged answers,

* "NOTE.—It was maintained for the respondents that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute is not appealable, but I am of opinion that this contention is not sound. It has been held in similar cases that, where the decision of a Sheriff-substitute does not dispose of the merits, there is a right of appeal to the Sheriff. The case of Leitch v. The Scottish Legal Burial Society (October 21, 1870, 9 Macph. p. 40) was very similar to the present. . . . Following the case of Leitch, I must hold that the decision referred to in the provision just quoted [Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, sec. 43] means a decision on the merits, and that the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute did not dispose of the merits, and are appealable. The case of Bone v. The School Board of Sorn (March 16, 1886, 13 R. p. 768) is also in point, although there was there no dismissal of the action by the Sheriff-substitute. The Court held that the Sheriff did not exceed his jurisdiction in recalling interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute which did not dispose of the merits, although one of the Judges thought that the appeal was irregular, as well as the previous procedure." (After quoting from the opinions of Lord Shand and Lord Adam in that case)—"These opinions are at variance with those of Lord Justice-Clerk (Moncreiff) and Lord Cowan in the case of Leitch, who held that, in such cases as the present, even decisions on the merits by a Sheriff-substitute were appealable to the Sheriff. It is unnecessary, however, in this case to determine what is the state of the law in regard to this point, because there has not yet been any decision on the merits. It would seem from his note as if the Sheriff-substitute intended to decide the merits of the case, but the interlocutor has not that effect. The action is only dismissed. There is no absolvitor. Moreover, it was premature to decide the merits. The debate was only ordered on the preliminary pleas, and the parties did not renounce probation. . . . An appeal then being competent, and a record having been irregularly made up, the question arises, What is now to be the procedure? Is the case to be concluded in the usual way followed in an ordinary action, or is it now to be dealt with in a summary manner? It seems to me that the latter is the most competent and expedient course to follow. . . . I think that the averments as to the inconvenience caused by the road in dispute not being repaired and maintained are relevant, and quite sufficient to entitle the pursuers to have an opportunity of leading proof. This will not be a written proof, but it may be understood that at the hearing—which, I think, is the proper thing to order in a summary case—the parties will be at liberty to examine witnesses. . . ."

in which they pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is incompetent. (3) No. 209. The pursuers' statements are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (4) The interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, not being a decision on the merits of the question raised by the appeal from the determination of the County Council, was not final, and was competently appealed to the Sheriff; or, separatim, the Sheriff on having the cause brought before him was entitled to recall the incompetent and irregular procedure that had taken place before the Sheriff-substitute, and to proceed to deal with the cause himself de novo. (5) If the Sheriff-substitute's judgment falls to be regarded as a decision on the merits it was competently recalled by the Sheriff, in respect that it was incompetent and contrary to justice, and was pronounced without hearing parties on the merits, and without any proof having been led or any opportunity given to these defenders of leading proof in support of their averments. (6) The interlocutors of the Sheriff having been competently pronounced in virtue of his jurisdiction, are not liable to be reduced.

On 9th June 1894, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced decree of reduction as concluded for.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The present action is brought by the County Council to reduce this interlocutor of the Sheriff, along with the note of appeal on which it proceeded, and a previous interlocutor by which he appointed parties to be heard.

"The ground of reduction is that the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff having under the statute a co-ordinate jurisdiction, either had jurisdiction to dispose of the case, and that the Sheriff-substitute having taken it upon himself to decide it, no appeal to the Sheriff was competent. The answer made is that the Sheriff-substitute did not decide the case, or at least did not decide it on its merits, and that until he did so it was open to the Sheriff to take it up and deal with it as he has now done. The defenders' case is very distinctly stated in the note of the Sheriff. It is founded on the decisions and dicta in the cases of Fleming v. Dickson, 1 M. 188, Leitch, 9 M. 40, and Bone, 13 R. 768.

"I quite agree with the Sheriff that if the Sheriff-substitute had merely dealt with preliminary matters—as, for example, the citation of the defenders, the appointment of a hearing, or the ordering of a proof—the authorities are in favour of the Sheriff's right to interpose and take up the case if he chose to do so. It may perhaps also be conceded upon the authorities that the same result follows where the Sheriff-substitute, without deciding the merits of the dispute, refuses on some technical ground to entertain the action. But I have not been able to agree with the Sheriff that the present case belongs to either of those categories. I do not say that the terms of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor are quite free from ambiguity; but I cannot read it otherwise than a decision of the cause and a decision upon its merits. The petition is dismissed, the whole pleas of the pursuers (the present defenders) being repelled; and one of the pleas so repelled is to the effect that the pursuers having, for the reasons stated in the condescendence, good cause for being dissatisfied with the defenders' determination, the prayer of the petition should be granted. I take it that, when the Sheriff-substitute repelled this plea, he in effect found that the pursuers' grounds of appeal were irrelevant, or were excluded by the admitted facts; and I suppose there is no doubt that when an action is decided upon relevancy it is as much decided upon the merits as if decided after a proof. That this was the Sheriff-substitute's view is, I think, manifest from his note, and I am not disposed to attach importance to the fact that he dismissed the petition instead of refusing it. I do not think that either of these expressions is such a vox signata as to be incapable of construction.

"But if this be so, it seems conclusive of the question as to the competency of the appeal to the Sheriff. It is said, no doubt, that the procedure before the Sheriff-substitute was irregular, because it ought to have been summary, whereas in fact a record was made up and closed. It is also said that if the Sheriff-substitute

The defenders reclaimed;—The arguments of the parties sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and of the Court.*

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Under the Local Government (Scotland) Act of 1889 a county council as coming in the place of the road trustees has authority to shut up roads within the county which they in their discretion may consider unnecessary, but their discretion in this matter is not final, because any three ratepayers in the county, if they are dissatisfied with the decision, are entitled to appeal to the Sheriff of the county, and he is entitled to review what the council have done as a matter of discretion, and his judgment is final.

In regard to such an appeal the statute provides that it is to be dealt with in a summary way, and also that it may be brought either before the Sheriff or before the Sheriff-substitute, because the Act says that the expression "Sheriff" includes "Sheriff-substitute."

In this case the Sheriff-substitute took up the appeal, and having heard parties upon what he called the preliminary pleas, he repelled the pursuers' pleas in law, and dismissed the action. The form of the interlocutor by which the Sheriff-substitute thus disposed of the action is certainly extraordinary, but I do not say more about it than that I do not understand how he arrived at the result he did, because while the interlocutor is one dismissing the action upon the merits of the case, the hearing was merely upon the preliminary pleas. Now, if the Sheriff-substitute deals with the matter in such a way that the interlocutor which he pronounces is not a proper interlocutor for the purpose, there must be some means of putting it right. Here the parties appealed to the Sheriff. When the matter was brought before the Sheriff he proceeded to deal with the matter as if it had come before himself at first, and put aside the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor altogether as being nugatory, and so unsatisfactory that it could not possibly stand. I think the Sheriff was entitled to take that course in this case. If the Sheriff-substitute had entered thoroughly into the matter and given a proper decision upon it, the Sheriff would not have been entitled to deal with the matter at all, but the result at which the Sheriff-substitute arrived was so unsatisfactory, and the procedure so irregular, that I think the Sheriff took the right course.

A further question was raised in the Sheriff Court action, which was not merely whether the County Council had used their discretion in a satisfactory way in ordering this road to be shut up, but whether in the circumstances it was within the competency of the County Council to order this road to be shut up at all. I think that the pursuers, who thought themselves aggrieved by the action of the County Council, were entitled to have a decision whether it was decided the merits, he did so after a hearing, which at least, according to the interlocutor appointing it, was a hearing upon preliminary pleas. But, assuming that these were irregularities, and irregularities which were serious, and which affected the result, it does not, so far as I can see, follow that the Sheriff-substitute's decision became thereby appealable to the Sheriff. Assuming it to be a decision, it was a decision which, while it stood, foreclosed any appeal. Whether it was or may yet be open to challenge by way of reduction, is a question which I do not require to consider. As the case stands, I think I am bound to hold that the case has been decided by the Sheriff-substitute, and therefore that the appeal to the Sheriff was incompetent, and that the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of their summons, with expenses."

within the competency of the Council or not to shut up this road, and that as in an ordinary action between them and the Council, and not as an appeal under this particular Act. I give no opinion at all upon the question of competency, but I think that the parties were entitled to bring it up for the decision of a Court of law.

Lastly, what the Sheriff did when the appeal was brought before him was to set aside all the proceedings that had taken place, and commence de novo. All that he did, however, by the interlocutor now objected to was to appoint parties to debate the case before him on a day to be afterwards fixed. The Sheriff has given no deliverance upon the question of the competency of the Council or as to the manner in which they used their discretion in shutting up the road. It is certainly a new thing that the interlocutor of a Sheriff appointing parties to be heard on the question before him should be brought before this Court by way of reduction, and I do not think that it is a competent course.

Upon all these grounds I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled.

LORD YOUNG.—This is a reduction of an interlocutor pronounced by the Sheriff of Roxburghshire, and the first and leading question is whether the reduction is competent. The interlocutor which the pursuers seek to have reduced is an interlocutor recalling an interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and appointing parties to be heard, and it is pronounced in what is in form an ordinary Sheriff Court process, with a prayer, a condescendence, and statement of facts and answers by the parties. Now, it certainly is a novel thing to have an interlocutor of a Sheriff, appointing the parties before him to be heard, made the subject of an action of reduction in this Court. If the Sheriff has gone wrong, his decision may ultimately be reviewed here in the ordinary way, but it is usual for us to wait until the Sheriff has disposed of the case before reviewing what he has done, although I do not say that there may not be cases in which we would interfere at an earlier stage to prevent the Sheriff from going on with the case.

The action in which this interlocutor was pronounced was an appeal regarding the procedure of the County Council of Roxburgh in declaring that a certain highway within their jurisdiction should cease to be a highway, and it was brought under the 43d section of the Roads and Bridges Act of 1878. Under the preceding sections of that Act, the County Council may proceed to declare in their discretion that any highway in their jurisdiction should cease to be a highway. That decision is not final, because the 43d section provides that there may be an appeal to the Sheriff, and in this appeal the matter may be taken up either by the Sheriff or by the Sheriff-substitute, but whichever of them takes up the appeal and determines the matter, his decision is declared by the Act to be final and not subject to review. But it is a conceivable case, and it is according to the averments here, that the County Council may think that it is within their competency to declare that a particular highway should cease to exist, when in truth it is not within their competency so to declare, and I think that any person interested in having the road kept open may have that question of competency tried, and tried at common law. Whether the Sheriff Court is a proper Court in which to have that question tried we are not called upon here to determine, but it is certainly a question which may be tried in a competent Court, so that it may be raised in the Sheriff Court, if that

No. 209. Court is competent, then brought here by way of appeal, and finally, if the parties so desire it, taken to the House of Lords, unless there is a statute which imposes finality on the judgments of any of the Courts below, but there is no suggestion of that sort here.

County
Council of Roxburgh v.
Trustees.

Now, when the County Council came to the determination that this road should be shut up, certain ratepayers expressed their dissatisfaction with this determination, and that upon two grounds, both of which they stated in the action in the Sheriff Court. The first ground was, that it was not competent for the County Council of Roxburgh, acting by themselves alone, to shut up this road within their county, because it was in truth only a part or fraction of a larger road which extended into an adjoining county. I give no opinion upon the merits of that question, but I think that it was a question which those who were dissatisfied with the determination of the County Council were entitled to raise and to have decided in a Court of law. Then the other ground of objection was, that assuming the objectors to be wrong on the question of the competency of the County Council to close this road, it was not a judicious act on the part of the County Council, in the exercise of their discretion, to close it, and the objectors accordingly desired to have the opinion of the Sheriff on that question as well as on the larger legal question of competency, and they brought both questions before the Sheriff in a petition under this statute, within the time allowed by the statute for appealing to the Sheriff. In that petition, a record having been made up, the Sheriff-substitute, on 15th December, issued an interlocutor in which, by an excusable use of language, he spoke of the legal question of competency as preliminary, and the pleas in law relating to that question as preliminary pleas, because it was necessary to dispose of the question of competency before deciding as to the manner in which the County Council had exercised their discretion, and he appointed the parties to be heard on those preliminary pleas. Then, after hearing the parties, the Sheriff-substitute, on 23d January, pronounced an interlocutor in which he repelled the pursuers' pleas to the competency of what the County Council had done, and then dismissed the action without having heard any argument on the question which arose when the question of competency was disposed of, namely, whether the Council, assuming that they had acted within their competency, had acted with propriety and discretion in closing the road. The pursuers appealed to the Sheriff, and I cannot for a moment doubt that they were entitled to appeal to him on the question of competency. The Sheriff recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute and appointed parties to be heard, and I understand from his note that if after hearing the parties he should have come to be of opinion that it was within the competency of the County Council to close this road, looking to its relation to other roads, he would then have taken up and disposed of the question whether they had well exercised their discretion in ordering it to be closed. I have no doubt as to the propriety of that course. I do not doubt that the Sheriff was entitled to take up the appeal on the question of competency, and I think also that he was entitled to hear and determine the question of discretion as well, seeing that the Sheriff-substitute had not disposed of that question, and that the Act provides that the appeal should either be to the Sheriff or to the Sheriff-substitute. I am of opinion, accordingly, that the interlocutor of the Sheriff is a perfectly competent and proper interlocutor, and to bring a reduction of such an interlocutor, pronounced in an action which is before the Sheriff upon a closed record, appears to me to be a most extravagant proceeding, for which I know of no precedent. I think that this action of No. 208. reduction is quite incompetent, and I am therefore of opinion that we should dispose of it by sustaining the first plea in law for the defenders and dismissing the action. July 19, 1894.

County
Council of Roxburgh v.
Trustees.

I do not know what may be the future course of the action in the Sheriff Court, but I assume that the Sheriff will deal with the question of competency in the first place, and then, if he is of opinion that it was within the competency of the County Council to close this road, he will also decide as to the discretion and propriety of their conduct. Whether there may be an appeal to this Court is a matter not now before us, but I see no objection to an appeal on the question of competency; on the other hand, if the Sheriff disposes of the question of discretion, I do not suppose that either of the parties will maintain that his judgment on that matter is not final.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.

Minor and Pupil—Religion of orphan children—Wishes of deceased father— July 19, 1894.
Morrison v.
Quarrier.
Minor's choice of religion.—Two orphan children, a brother and sister, twelve years of age, were placed by their brother, thirty years of age, in a charitable institution not Roman Catholic. A short time afterwards he presented a petition to the Court to have them restored to his custody, averring that they were not being brought up in the Roman Catholic faith, which he alleged to be that of their father, and that the children wished to be removed. The Court appointed a curator ad litem to the children. The Court being satisfied, on a statement made by him, that the children were well provided for in the Home, that the girl, a minor pube, was desirous of remaining where she was, that both children were averse to being separated, and that the father's conduct shewed that he wished to have them brought up as Protestants, refused the petition.

Opinions (per Lord Adam and Lord M'Laren) that the wishes of a deceased father with reference to the religious training of his children, though entitled to weight, are not conclusive on the subject, the paramount consideration being the interests of the children themselves.

(SEQUEL of case reported supra, p. 889.)

On 16th July 1894 Mr Lee, the curator ad litem for the children, lodged a minute, in which he stated, inter alia, that the wards were both healthy and happy looking children, and were evidently well fed and cared for, and that Margaret unhesitatingly said that she would rather stay where she was than go back to Dundee, or live with the Browns.

"The ward Alexander confirmed his sister's statements, and expressed substantially the same views as she did. He looked and professed himself to be very happy in his new home.

"The wards seemed to have a great affection for each other, and desired that in any event they should not be separated. . . .

"The curator has satisfied himself, from the statements of his wards and from other reliable and more detailed information laid before him, that it would not be to the moral or physical advantage of the children that they should return to the custody of the petitioner.

1ST DIVISION.

Morrison v.
Quarrier.

"A third alternative was suggested by the petitioner, videlicet, that the wards should be removed to a Roman Catholic institution at Smyllum, Lanark, . . . and the curator cannot doubt that, were there any evidence to suggest that his wards had been brought up as Roman Catholics, or that their severance from that religion would in any way alienate them from their relatives, this would be a highly suitable place for their upbringing."

The passages of the minute bearing on the question of religion were as follows:—"The ward Margaret further stated that while in Dundee she had never attended any church except the Hilltown Mission. When she was nearly nine years of age, a lady, who visited her mother on her deathbed, recommended that the children should go there, and from that time they were taken there regularly, or at least frequently, by their father until the time of his death; since the father's death they had never been to church. She also stated that her father had sent them to a Protestant school, which she described as 'Mr Dickson's school,' and that after his death, when they were living with the petitioner, they remained at this school until the petitioner got out of work and sent them to the Homes. She could not remember that her father ever went to church before they began to go to the Hilltown Mission, nor could she remember that the petitioner or his wife ever went to any church for long before she left Dundee.

"The curator does not doubt that the parents of his wards were married as Roman Catholics, and the wards themselves were baptised by the Reverend Patrick Crotty, Roman Catholic clergyman, on 7th March 1891, when they were nine years old. Both parents before their death received the last rites of the Roman Catholic Church. The curator, however, has been unable to find any evidence that they were ever regular attendants at the services of any Roman Catholic church, or that their children, Margaret and Alexander, ever attended a Roman Catholic church at all. On the other hand, the curator has seen several persons connected with the Hilltown Mission, which is carried on in connection with Panmure Street Congregational Church, and has by their evidence verified the statement of the wards. The father of the children attended with considerable regularity, for a period of fully two years immediately prior to his death, the evening services at this mission, being frequently accompanied by his children Margaret and Alexander, who also attended the children's forenoon service. The father also occasionally attended the Panmure Street Congregational Church. When applying for assistance from the parochial board on 14th November 1892, and also in prison so late as 1st May 1893, the father represented himself as being a Protestant, though on other similar occasions he had stated that he was a Roman Catholic. . . .

"The curator, while he believes that the wards' family is Roman Catholic, has been unable to find any indication that the wards were ever truly brought up in that faith; on the contrary, after careful consideration of all the information he has been able to obtain, he is convinced that any religious instruction the children ever had was from Protestant sources, deliberately chosen and acquiesced in by their father."

On the Court resuming consideration of the cause, counsel for the petitioner stated that the only point he now insisted in was that steps should be taken to secure that the children should be brought up as Roman Catholics.

Argued for the petitioner;—The parents having both been Roman Catholics, and the children having themselves been baptised into and brought up in that faith, they should not now be trained as Protestants.

The father had a right to determine the religion of his children, and it was not doubtful that the father here had selected the Roman Catholic faith. Apart from evidence of his desire, there was a strong presumption in favour of his religion being that of his children.¹

Morrison v.
Quarrier.

Argued for the respondent;—The report made it clear that the interests of the children demanded that they should be left where they were. The girl being a minor pubes was entitled to speak for herself not only as regarded her residence but also as regarded her religion,² and it would be most inexpedient to separate the two children. The father had left no express direction on the subject of his children's religion, and the inference from his conduct in this connection was rather that he preferred for them the Protestant to the Roman Catholic faith.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the two children are orphans, the mother having died in 1891 and the father in October 1893. They are at present in an establishment called the Orphan Homes of Scotland, and from the report of the curator it appears that they are living in comfort and content, and are getting suitable instruction so far as secular education is concerned. The sole ground for this petition is, that they are not being brought up in the Roman Catholic faith. The father survived the mother, but died, as I have said, last year. Now, it is necessary for the petitioner, on his own view of the law, to make out that it was the wish of the father that the children should be brought up in the Roman Catholic faith, and that there are means available for their being so brought up without detriment to their general interests. As regards the last point I am willing to assume, what the reporter seems to be satisfied of, that the Roman Catholic establishment called the Smyllum Orphanage is one in which the children would be well attended to and properly taken care of. I am willing to assume that, and the case must be taken on that footing. But then the proposition which has to be made out is that it would be according to the wish of the father that the children should be taken from the place in which they are well cared for at present and sent elsewhere, solely in order that they may be brought up in the Roman Catholic faith. Now, I agree that, if there were nothing to the contrary, the fact that the father and mother were Roman Catholics, and died members of the Roman Catholic Church, would raise a strong presumption that the wish of the father was that the children should be brought up in the Roman Catholic faith. I agree with what was said in the case of Magrath,—"The wishes of the father, if not clearly expressed by him, must be inferred from his conduct. If the father be dead it will be naturally inferred that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, his wish was that the children should be brought up in his own religion,—that is, the religion which he professed." But the question here is, whether there is not sufficient evidence to rebut the presumption arising from that fact, whether, in place of our having to depend on inference from the father's choice of religion for himself, we have not sufficient evidence otherwise of his choice of religion for his children.

The facts stand thus: It is true that the children are baptised members of the Roman Catholic Church, but then it must not be left out of sight that they were not baptised until 1891, and accordingly that they were not brought up from their birth as members of the Roman Catholic Church, but were baptised at an unusually late age, and under circumstances which are left to conjecture. But then what evidence is there of the father taking the children to any religious ordinances at all? There is none, as Mr Gunn quite properly admitted, of his having taken them to a Roman Catholic church himself, and there is clear evidence that he took them to a Congregational church regularly, or at least frequently, going with them himself. It is plain that he was a somewhat lax Roman Catholic, as he occasionally went to the Congregational church himself. But what we are concerned with is this, Is there not evidence of his having brought up his children in the Protestant faith, or at least of his having been tolerant of the Protestant faith, and of having conduced to the bringing up of his children in the Protestant faith? It seems to me that when we are asked to remove the children from a place where they are being otherwise well brought up, the petitioner's case fails, for he has to establish first that there is reasonable evidence to conclude that the father would have wished to place the children in a purely Roman Catholic establishment. Now, the inference naturally arising from the father's own religion is entirely displaced by the way in which he arranged for the instruction of his children, so far as religion was concerned; and the various circumstances mentioned in the curator's report lend an air of probability to the conjecture that the father not being himself a firmly-attached member of the Roman Catholic Church, thought it more to the children's advantage that they should be brought up as Protestants. Such, at least, is the inference I draw from his own conduct.

What I have said would apply only directly to the case of the boy, for he is a pupil. When we turn to the case of the girl Mr Gunn is confronted with a difficulty which, he frankly admitted, he did not see an answer to. What right has the Court of Session, on grounds such as are here put forward, to remove a girl who is a minor pubes, when there is evidence that she prefers to remain where she is? That itself, apart from other considerations, forms a supreme difficulty in the way of granting the petition, and, like Mr Gunn, I have not seen an answer to it. But when along with that I find that the petitioner's case, in point of fact, is negatived by the evidence, the evidence rather shewing that the father preferred a Protestant education for his children to a Roman Catholic education, I think there is no difficulty in disposing of the petition so far as the girl is concerned. As to the boy, the one ground of failure of evidence of the father's wish is sufficient for the disposal of the case, but it is also to be noted that the children are attached to one another and desire to be together, and that it is impossible to suggest that the interest of either would be subserved by the one being taken and the other left. I am for refusing the petition.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. When the petition was before us on a former occasion, we felt, or at anyrate a majority of the Court felt, that the facts were not sufficiently before us to enable us to dispose of it satisfactorily. Accordingly, we took the step of appointing a curator to the children, and of obtaining through him a statement of the actual circumstances. We have now got a very careful and very excellent report from Mr Lee, the curator, which gives us all the necessary information.

We are dealing with two children who are twins, one of whom, being a girl, is in minority; the other is a boy, and is still a pupil. Now, I agree that the wishes of a father may be the predominant consideration to be kept in view in these applications, but I may be allowed to say that I do not know that by the law of Scotland the same paramount weight is to be given to them as seems to be attached to them by the law of England, almost to the exclusion of the consideration of the interests of the children. I am not aware that the law of Scotland goes so far in that direction as the law of England. Apparently the latter ignores the wishes of the mother, and in other points also the laws of the two countries appear to me to be different. Now, here we have not got clearly what even in the law of England is so very prominent a consideration, viz., the desire of the father. There is no evidence of an express desire, and that being so, we must have recourse to an inference as to what would have been his desire. Now, if there were no acts or conduct of his to refer to, and if it appeared to us that the religion of the father and the mother was Roman Catholic, I should have been very willing to draw the inference that in such circumstances the father would have desired his children to be brought up in his own faith. But we know in this case how he regarded the matter; we know that the children did not attend Roman Catholic chapels, and that during his lifetime they were in the habit of going to a Protestant church. If the father were alive and were asked if it was his wish that the children should be educated as Protestants, it appears to me on the facts stated by Mr Lee that he would say "Yes." At anyrate, it is very clear to me that he would not express any strong desire that they should be brought up as Roman Catholics. Taking the case of the girl, who is a minor, and is entitled to express her own wishes in the matter (and she has done so very clearly), are we to overrule her desires? I think not. In England this girl would be an infant, and I do not know that even in the case of an infant of twenty years of age her wishes would be regarded (and this illustrates the manifest difficulty there is in the application of English cases to which I formerly adverted), but I am clear that we should not overrule the express desire of this minor. It is quite true that the boy is a pupil, but it is evidently undesirable, and not in their interests, that the children should be separated. I therefore concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair, and I also desire, like Lord Adam, in case the question may afterwards arise, to reserve my opinion as to the supposed exclusive preference of the father's opinion in regard to the education of children who may have been left under the care of the mother, because under the Guardianship of Infants Act greater authority is now given to the mother than could formerly be claimed for her, and that is a consideration which I should not wish to overlook in dealing with any question such as this. I can conceive of cases where it would be very much to the advantage of children that they should be in the care and under the influence of their mother even where her opinions should happen to differ from those of a deceased father. Probably this does not very frequently arise, because there will generally be an understanding between parents on such subjects, but I should not wish to be understood as assenting to the doctrine that under all circumstances the wish of a deceased father must prevail in regard to the religious education of his children, irrespective of circumstances which he could not foresee.

MARGARET BROWN FISHER, Petitioner.—*Lees—Salvesen.*JAMES GLEN EDGAR, Respondent.—*Dickson—Christie.*July 20, 1894.
Fisher v.
Edgar.

Administration of justice—Contempt of Court—Parent and Child—Custody of child.—A father presented a petition for the custody of his pupil daughter, and obtained decree against an aunt of the child ordaining her to deliver the child to him. The aunt not having done so, the Court ordered her to attend personally at the bar, and on her failure to obey this order sequestered her estates.

Thereafter the aunt presented a petition for the recall of the sequestration. She explained that she had not received service of the order, and that the state of her health made it dangerous for her to attend, and by her counsel she submitted herself unreservedly to the judgment of the Court.

The father lodged answers to the aunt's petition, in which he submitted that the sequestration ought not to be recalled until she had handed the child over to him.

It appeared from a minute by a curator ad litem appointed to the child that the child, who had by this time attained the age of twelve years, had resided for nearly eight years with her aunt, and that she had a decided wish to remain with her.

The Court, without requiring the aunt's personal presence, and without requiring her to deliver up the child, recalled the sequestration.

1ST DIVISION. (SEE Edgar v. Fisher's Trustees, Nov. 10, 1893, supra, p. 59, and Dec. 20, 1893, supra, p. 325.)

On 13th June 1894 Miss Fisher presented a petition to the Court for recall of the sequestration of her estates and of the factory and the appointment of Mr MacLeod as factor thereon (see supra, p. 59), and also as factor loco tutoris to Everina Edgar (see supra, p. 325).

She made the following averments:—Everina Edgar was born on 26th May 1882. Her mother died on 16th June 1884, and in June 1886 the child was placed in the custody of the petitioner and her mother (who died in August 1893), and remained with the petitioner until 1st September 1893, when she was removed by her father. [These statements were not denied by the child's father, Mr Edgar, who lodged answers to the petition.] On 3d September the child returned to the petitioner, and the petitioner then left for England along with the child, being afraid that it would endanger the health of the child if she were restored to her father's custody.

The petition for custody had not been served upon her, and she had first heard of the proceedings on 8th September 1893. She had then endeavoured to persuade the child to go back to her father, but she had absolutely refused to do so. She had returned to Scotland in May 1894, when she heard for the first time of the sequestration of her estates. The child had attained the age of twelve years on 26th May 1894, and had since that date voluntarily written to her father stating that she had elected to stay with the petitioner, and the petitioner believed that it would be prejudicial to the child's health and welfare if she were compelled to reside with her father.

"The petitioner humbly craves your Lordships not to ordain her to appear at the bar of your Lordships' Court. She believes that her state of health would render it dangerous for her to be subjected to such an ordeal. . . . If necessary, the petitioner is prepared to produce medical testimony certifying her unfitness to appear before a Court in public, and the grave injury to her health to which she might thereby be exposed."

The respondent, James Glen Edgar, explained that he had reluctantly parted with his child in 1886 to gratify the wish of her grandmother that she should live with her. He denied the petitioner's statement No. 211. that she did not know of the sequestration of her estates until May 1894, and averred that the letter written by the child since she had ceased to be a pupil was not a voluntary and uninfluenced letter. He submitted,—“That his said daughter is not entitled now to insist that her own residence should be away from him, and that she ought to be restored to his custody. There is no foundation for the statement that it would have been in September, or would now be, prejudicial to the child's health or welfare to reside with her father. The respondent is in a position to give her a happy home, where she will receive from him every kindness, and will have the society of her brother and sister. . . . The respondent respectfully submits that the sequestration, having been originally laid on because of petitioner's contempt of Court, ought not to be recalled until she has delivered the said child to the respondent. The appointment of Mr MacLeod as factor loco tutoris, quoad the estate, heritable and moveable, of the said Everina Burns Edgar, stands on a different footing, and the respondent respectfully asks the Court to refuse to recall this appointment. The respondent respectfully urges that the administration of his said daughter's whole estate, presently vested in Mr MacLeod, should be left with him as her curator bonis.”

July 20, 1894.
Fisher v.
Edgar.

The Court appointed Mr Charles C. Maconochie, advocate, curator ad litem to Everina Edgar, and instructed him to report on the whole circumstances of the case.

He reported that he had had a meeting with his ward, and that she looked well and happy and well cared for.

“The ward was most distinct and emphatic in the expression of her wish to remain with her aunt, to whom she is evidently genuinely attached. This attachment is, it seems to the curator, the main cause of her wish to live with the petitioner; but she also seems to be satisfied that she would be more comfortable and well cared for in her aunt's house than in that of her father. For her father she seems to feel little or no affection. She would not say that he had ever been unkind to her, but says that she knows little about him, and her main objection to going to live permanently in his house appeared to be that, in doing so, she would be leaving ‘home,’ and going to live in a strange place.

“The view of the curator, that the ward is quite a free agent in the matter, was, if possible, strengthened by what he saw of the manner of the ward and petitioner towards one another during the time when both were in the room. He is satisfied that they are much attached to one another, and that the petitioner has used no other influence than that of affection and kindness to induce the child to express her wish to remain with her.

“On the whole matter, the curator has no hesitation in stating it as his opinion that it would be a real grief to the ward, and directly contrary to her genuine wishes, were she taken away from the petitioner's house and sent to live with her father.”

Argued for the petitioner;—1. The child had made her election. A minor was entitled to select her own residence against the wishes of a curator, and a father had no higher right in a question of residence than an ordinary curator.¹ He certainly had not an absolute right of control. The one consideration which would weigh with the Court was the well-being of the child herself. Now the reporter was satisfied that she was well cared for and happy with her aunt, and better with her than she would be with her father. Besides the child had not been withdrawn from the custody of her father. She had for most of her life been living with the petitioner.

2. The sequestration ought to be recalled without enforcing the petitioner's personal presence. That would seriously affect her health. She had not heard of the order of the Court until a month after the sequestration. She now submitted herself unreservedly to the judgment of the Court as regarded the custody of the child.

Argued for the respondent;—1. By virtue of the patria potestas a father had far higher powers than an ordinary curator, and he was entitled to control the residence of a minor child.¹ The legal presumption was in favour of his right, and it was only when there was a danger to the child's wellbeing, moral or physical, that the Court would deprive him of his right. That was the ground of the decision in Harvey's case.² But there was nothing of that kind suggested here. It would be far better for the child to associate with her father and stepbrother and sister than with an aunt whose health was extremely delicate.

2. The sequestration should not be recalled until the child had been handed over to her father.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It may be convenient first to consider the question which arises on the respondent's demand that this sequestration should not be recalled unless the child Everina Edgar be delivered over to him. Now, from the report of the curator ad litem it is quite clear that the girl has a preference, and an intelligent and distinct preference, for residing with her aunt, and that she is opposed to being removed from the society in which she has lived for a number of years, and being taken to her father's house. That being so, I suppose we have before us the primary consideration which has to be regarded, and there is no statement on the part of the respondent that this girl is being treated otherwise than with kindness in the home in which she has now for some time lived. Accordingly, so far as the interests and welfare of the child are concerned, it seems to me that they coincide with her wishes, because if she is well where she is, it would, at all events, prima facie be against her interests that she should be taken to a house with which she is not familiar, and to which at present she has a strong disinclination to go. Now the father asserts his right to have the child returned to him, and that upon a purely legal ground. I cannot say that we have here anything to shew that the father has so high a right as to override the choice of his minor daughter where the choice is quite sustained by the general wellbeing of the child. Therefore, I think the claim of the father cannot be given effect to.

As regards the sequestration, Miss Fisher has certainly been, to say the least, unfortunate in the predicament in which she has found herself placed. And it is to be regretted that her information about the steps which were being taken with regard to the child had not been more precise. We had to take against her the strong step of sequestering her estates and withholding any payments from these estates so long as she did not submit herself to the judgment of the Court in the matter of this child's custody. But she has done so now, and that unreservedly, and her counsel have stated considerations which I think are sufficient to make it proper that we should not insist upon her personal presence at the bar. The statements of counsel are responsibly made, and must be regarded as her own. That being so, I think she has sufficiently purged her contempt to enable us to recall sequestration, and it would seem that the factory should follow the fate of the sequestration.

Fisher v.
Edgar.

LORD ADAM.—I entertain a strong opinion that the best place for a child is its father's house, and unless there be exceptionally strong circumstances I should be very unwilling to place a child in the custody of any other person. But I think with your Lordship that the circumstances here are sufficient to overcome that objection, and to lead us to do what would otherwise have been a matter of reluctance on my part. In point of fact, this child has for several years past been brought up by the aunt—at least by the grandmother and the aunt. The grandmother is now dead, and the result, and the very natural result of that is, as we see from Mr Maconochie's report, that this child has acquired a very strong affection for her aunt, and it would be a matter of grief, and probably at her age of lasting grief, to her to be now separated from her aunt and to go back to her father's house, where she has practically never lived, and to reside with her father, for whom, although he appears to be kind enough, she does not entertain any such affection as she probably would have entertained had she lived with him during her earlier years. In these circumstances, the question comes to be, are we to overrule the strongly expressed wish of this child, who is a minor, to stay with her aunt? I am not prepared to do that in this case, and therefore I concur with your Lordship.

LORD M'LAREN.—In considering this case we approach the question from this point of view, that the powers of a father over his minor child are certainly less than those which he possesses with reference to his pupil child, and are also, I think, higher than those of a mere curator chosen by the child after the father's death. It is plain enough that if the child has independent means, and at a suitable age desires to go to a college or school, or to be apprenticed to a business, the father could not insist on keeping the minor at home to dig in his garden, which seems to be Lord Stair's measure of a father's right, at least to the age of twenty-one. Without carrying the notion of patria potestas so far, I, for one, can subscribe to all that the late Lord President, when Lord Justice-Clerk, said in the case of Harvey, and I should be unwilling to suggest any doubt as to the legitimate control which a father must always have on the conduct, residence, and upbringing of his child during minority. But his powers are not absolute; they are liable to be restrained on an application to the Court on good and sufficient grounds, among which the reasonable wishes of the child are a material element. Now, here we begin with this state of circumstances induced by the act of the father himself. He had himself, after the death of his first wife, acquiesced in his daughter residing with her aunt, and now that his daughter has been brought to look upon her aunt's house as her home the father seeks to alter this arrangement, apparently without good reason, and against the wishes of his daughter. In these circumstances, I agree with your Lordship, there being no pecuniary question involved, that we cannot support this extreme exercise of the father's powers. We granted the prayer which he asked when the child was a pupil, but she has now attained minority, and that, of course, introduces a new element into the case, and entitles us to consult the wishes of the daughter herself. I agree that Miss Fisher, if she has not cleared herself of the imputation of having

No. 211. neglected to obey the orders of Court, has at least so submitted herself to the authority and judgment of the Court as to be entitled to have the sequestration which was formerly granted as a compulsitor against her recalled, and the factory terminated.

Teinds—Bona fide perception and consumption—Belief that teinds exhausted—Relevancy.—In an action at the instance of a proprietor of teinds against the proprietor of the lands for arrears of surplus teinds, the defender admitted that the pursuer was the proprietor of the teinds, but pleaded bona fide consumption, averring that he had regularly paid his proportion of the minister's stipend in the belief that the teind was thereby exhausted. Held that the defenders' statements were not relevant to support the plea of bona fide consumption.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of the
Peebles.

IN January 1894 Mr Horatio Ross Macrae, judicial factor on the estate of the deceased Neil G. Buchanan, of Knockshinnoch, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against the Assets Company, having their registered office in Edinburgh, for payment of arrears of free teinds from 1884 onwards, amounting to £25, 12s. 1½d., with periodical interest thereon.

The pursuer stated (Cond. 2) that he was proprietor of the teinds of Little Udston, in the county of Lanark, and that the defenders were the proprietors of the lands, their entry as such being in July 1884. (Ans. 2) "Admitted."

He further stated;—(Cond. 3) "The free teinds of the said lands are due and resting owing to the pursuer from crop 1864 to crop 1893 inclusive. . . . The free teind prior to crop 1864 was paid to the pursuer's predecessors." (Cond. 4) "The portion of the said free teind applicable to crop 1884, and subsequent crops, is due and resting owing to the pursuer by the defenders as intromitters with the stock and teinds of said lands. The said portion of free teind to crop 1892 amounts to £25, 12s. 1½d., which, besides interest thereon, is due and resting owing to the pursuer by the defenders."

The defenders averred;—(Answer to articles 3 and 4) "Admitted that the defenders have not paid any of the free teinds here specified since the date of their entry. . . . Quoad ultra not known, and not admitted. It is further explained (1) that the defenders, since the date of their entry, have regularly paid their proportion of stipend which they believed exhausted the teinds; (2) that no claim was made by the pursuers, or anyone else, against the defenders for free teinds until 11th January 1892, and that the pursuer had no title to uplift or discharge the teind till 5th November 1892; (3) that the defenders have regularly, since 1884, divided the whole available revenue of the company among the shareholders every half year, and that the free teinds now claimed have thus been consumed in bona fide."

The defenders pleaded;—The defenders, having in bona fide consumed the free teinds for the crops 1884 to 1891 inclusive, should be assoilzied from the pursuer's claim therefor, and quoad ultra the petition is unnecessary, and should be dismissed, with expenses. No. 212.

On 7th February 1894 the Sheriff-substitute (Rutherford) repelled the defences and ordained the defenders to make payment to the pursuer of £25, 12s. 1½d., with interest thereon at five per cent from the date of citation. July 20, 1894.
Macrae v.
Assets Co.,
Limited.

The defenders appealed, and on 7th March 1894 the Sheriff (Blair) dismissed the appeal.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The defenders had been in absolute good faith in believing that the teind was exhausted; that belief was induced by the pursuer's inaction since at least 1884, and in that belief the teind had been consumed. The claim for arrears was therefore excluded.¹ A reference to the titles shewed that the defenders were truly proprietors of the teinds; a fortiori, they had a colourable title to them.

Argued for the pursuer;—The argument on the titles was in the teeth of the defenders' admissions and statements, and there was no foundation for it on record. The only plea stated was bona fide consumption, and that was excluded, because the defenders did not aver either a colourable title or that they had consumed the teinds in the belief that they had a right to do so. They stated their belief to be that there was no free teind. But a mistaken notion as to the existence of teinds was not equivalent to a colourable title.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The only plea stated on this record is that of bona fide consumption of the free teinds. Now, your Lordships will observe that it is admitted by the defenders that the pursuer is proprietor of the teinds in question, that they (the defenders) have intromitted with the teinds, and that they have not paid any free teinds to the pursuer since the date of their entry.

These admissions are sufficient to entitle the pursuer to decree, unless the defenders have set forth some relevant defence. The only defence they state is, as I have already said, bona fide consumption. That defence applies where a person not being the true owner of a subject, but being in the bona fide belief under some colourable title that he is, consumes the fruits. But in this case the defender does not aver that he was in the bona fide belief that he was the owner of the teinds, and that in that belief he consumed them. His defence is of quite a different nature, viz., that he thought that the stipend exhausted the teind, and that there was no free teind—that is to say, merely that they thought no debt was due. That does not appear to me to present a case for the application of the doctrine of bona fide consumption at all, and in my opinion is not a relevant defence. We had, however, a long argument on the construction and effect of the titles of the parties for the purpose of shewing not only that the defender had a colourable title to the teinds but was in fact the true owner. Not only, however, are there no averments on record to support any such pleas, but they are entirely contradictory of the defenders' own admissions and statements on record. We cannot, therefore, consider these pleas, and the defenders did not ask to be allowed to amend their record.

Macrae v.
Assets Co.,

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord Adam. I think the statements of the defenders upon record necessarily exclude from our consideration the question argued at the debate. We had an argument on the appellants' title tending to shew (first) that the defenders have an absolute right to the teinds, and (second) if not an absolute right, such a prima facie right as to give them a colourable title to consume the teinds in good faith. Now, that position is excluded, in the first place, because there is an unqualified and absolute admission of the pursuer's right of property in the teinds, and in the second place, because while that admission still left open a plea of colourable title and bona fide consumption, that plea again is excluded by the defenders' answer to the 3d and 4th articles of the condescendence, because they say that they have regularly paid their proportion of stipend which they believed exhausted the teinds. Now, the plea of bona fide consumption means that the owner of the land has drawn and applied to his own purposes the free teinds not carried off for stipend, in the honest belief that his title gave him the right to do so. But the defenders do not say that they consumed the free teind on the faith of an apparent title, but that they did not know there was any free teind. They say that their belief was that the teinds were exhausted by the stipend. If this was a mistake there is nothing on record to suggest that the unexhausted teind could belong to anyone but the pursuer.

I quite agree with Lord Adam therefore that the defence is irrelevant.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Dismiss the appeal: Affirm the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 7th February 1894, and decern," &c.

Process—Expenses—Time of lodging objections to the Auditor's report—A. S., July 20, 1894.
Feb. 6, 1806.—The Act of Sederunt, Feb. 6, 1806, enacts that “in case either party means to object to the report of the Auditor he shall immediately lodge with the clerk a note of his objections.” Held that, as a general rule, objections must be lodged within forty-eight hours, and that the forty-eight hours run from the date of the Auditor's issuing his report, and not from the date when the report is lodged in process.

Circumstances in which objections were allowed to be lodged on the eighth day after the report was signed.

In December 1893 A B brought an action against C D, her husband, for declarator of nullity of marriage. Proof in the case was fixed for the 24th May 1894. On the instructions of the defender two medical men were sent to London to examine the pursuer, with a view to their giving evidence at the trial.

On the 22d May the pursuer having lodged a minute of abandonment, the defender's account of expenses was remitted to the Auditor.

The Auditor's report was signed 3d July. On 4th July the defender's agents wrote to their client to ask instructions as to objecting to the Auditor's report, and received an answer on 6th July. Objections were lodged for the defender on 11th July, and the process and report were returned to the Clerk of Court on the same day.

The main objections were to the disallowance by the Auditor of £299, 5s., and £312, 18s., of fees of £315 and £323, 8s. charged by the defender for his medical witnesses.

The pursuer maintained that the objections were lodged too late.

On 14th July 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) reported the matter to the First Division.*

* “NOTE.— . . . The pursuer maintains that the defender's objections were lodged too late, not being lodged till eight days after the report was signed by the Auditor.

“The defender maintains that there being no inflexible rule as to the time within which objections must be lodged, the delay—five days from receiving instructions—was in the circumstances not too great. He further maintains that, as the objections were lodged whenever the process was returned to the clerk they were timeously lodged, in other words, that the forty-eight hours which are allowed in practice, run not from signature and completion of the report but from the time when it is lodged in process. It is mainly in regard to this point that I report the case.

“No time within which objections must be lodged is fixed by statute or Act of Sederunt applicable to the Court of Session as is done in the Act of Sederunt of 10th July 1839, sec. 109, as to procedure in the Sheriff Courts, by which only forty-eight hours from the completion of taxation are allowed. The words of the Act of Sederunt are,—‘It shall be competent for either party within forty-eight hours after an account has been taxed, to lodge a note of specific objections to such taxation,’ &c.

“By the Act of Sederunt on 6th February 1806 the Auditor of the Court of Session, who was then for the first time appointed, was directed to examine and tax the account, and report thereon to the Court or the Lord Ordinary; and it was further enacted that ‘in case either party means to object to the report of the Auditor he shall immediately lodge with the clerk a note of his objections.’

“By the Act of Sederunt 11th July 1828, sec. 69, it was provided that ‘after the account is taxed the agent’—that is, the agent for the party found entitled to expenses—‘shall be entitled to get back the process in order to return the same to the clerk.’

No. 214. The defender argued;—By the Act of Sederunt 6th February 1806 objections were to be lodged “immediately.” That had been interpreted in practice to mean forty-eight hours, but it was uncertain whether the terminus a quo the forty-eight hours ran was the issuing of the report or the lodging of the report in process. The latter was the correct view and as here the objections were lodged within forty-eight hours of the lodging of the report in process, they were timeously lodged. In any view the Court had a discretion in the matter, and would not construe an Act of Sederunt so strictly as an Act of Parliament.¹ Here, looking to the relation of parties, and the magnitude of the sum involved, the defender’s agents were entitled to time to consult their client. After receiving instructions to object, Saturday and Sunday intervened before anything could be done. In the whole circumstances, therefore, there had been no real delay, and besides the pursuers had suffered no inconvenience. In Stewart’s case² there had been a delay of over a month.

A B v. C D.

Argued for the pursuer;—The question was foreclosed, depending as it did on the Act of Sederunt, as explained by universal practice, which had construed “immediately” to mean within forty-eight hours from taxation. That was the rule expressly enacted in the Act of Sederunt dealing with the Sheriff Court.³ The Auditor was functus after the account was taxed.⁴ It was admitted that on special cause shewn the rule might be departed from, but no such cause had been shewn here.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The view I take, in the first place, is that the time from which the forty-eight hours run is the time at which the Auditor has returned his report in the sense of handing it back to the agent who has tendered it to him for audit; that the forty-eight hours run, in short, from the promulgation of the report, and not from the date at which it is lodged in process. Otherwise the date would be an entirely uncertain date, and one more or less determinable by a person whose interest might be to create delay.

In the second place, however, the case in hand appears to me to be a fair case for holding that the objections to the report are not too late. This was evidently a moot point in practice, and the circumstances mentioned at the bar would lead me to admit an extension of the usual period of forty-eight hours.

“No decision precisely in point has been cited to me. In the case of Adamson & Gulland v. Gardner, 15 S. L. R. 664, the late Lord President Inglis, in his opinion, spoke of the forty-eight hours allowed in practice as running from the time when the Auditor’s report was lodged with the clerk of Court. His Lordship’s words are,—‘In ordinary cases objections cannot be received more than forty-eight hours after the process has been returned from the Auditor.’

“The only other case referred to was the recent case of Stewart & Company v. Johnstone, 20 R. 832, decided by the First Division of the Court of Session. The argument proceeded on the assumption that, according to custom, the note of objections must in general be lodged within forty-eight hours. But the question here raised did not purely arise, because the note of objections was not lodged until a month after the taxation of the account, and probably long after the report was lodged.

“A considerable sum depends upon these objections, and as it is of some importance to remove doubt on the point of practice, I feel justified in reporting the matter to the Court.”

MacBrayne.

Reparation—Wrongous apprehension—Liability of master for act of servant—Relevancy—Issue—Malice and want of probable cause—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 63), secs. 35 and 37.—Under sections 35 and 37 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1863, it is lawful for the master or other officer of a passenger steamer to apprehend a passenger who has refused to pay his fare.

In an action of damages brought by a passenger against the owner of a passenger steamer, the pursuer averred that he had been wrongously apprehended by a purser in the employment of the defender, on the ground that he had refused to pay his fare, and proposed an issue whether the defender had “wrongfully and oppressively” caused the apprehension. The defender pleaded that the action was irrelevant, in respect that the purser alone was responsible for the act complained of, and that, in any event, the pursuer was bound to insert “malice and want of probable cause” in the issue. Held that the action was relevant, in respect (1) that the defender had a statutory power to arrest on the ground alleged, and (2) that, on the averments of the pursuer, the purser had acted within the scope of his employment as a servant of the defender, and an issue whether the defender had “wrongfully and illegally” caused the apprehension approved.

Reparation—Wrongous prosecution—Limitation of action—Summary Procedure Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. 53), sec. 35.—By section 35 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, it is provided that,—“Every action against any . . . person on account of anything done in any case instituted under this Act shall be commenced within two months after the cause of action shall have arisen. . . .” In August 1893 a conviction was obtained, on a complaint under the Summary Procedure Act, against a passenger on a steamer for travelling without a ticket. On 23d January 1894 the conviction was quashed, on the ground that the complaint had been brought without the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal. On 30th January 1894 the passenger raised an action of damages against the shipowner for wrongous prosecution. Held that although the complaint had been quashed on account of defective instance, it was not the less a proceeding under the Act, and that by section 35 the action was barred.

On 30th January 1894 John Lundie, shoemaker, Maybole, and formerly residing at Fort-William, brought an action of damages against David MacBrayne, shipowner, Glasgow, for (1) illegal apprehension on 10th August 1893, and (2) illegal prosecution on 24th August 1893.

The pursuer averred;—“On 10th August 1893 the pursuer, who was taking a pony belonging to him from Oban to Fort-William, contracted with the defender’s agent at Oban for the carriage of said pony and for a steerage passage for himself per the said steamer ‘Chevalier.’ The freight charge was fixed at 5s., which pursuer paid, and received a receipt therefor. . . . He was not challenged by any of the defender’s servants for a pass when going aboard said steamer as aforesaid, nor was any demand made upon him until the steamer was within twelve miles of Fort-William, when John James Lawson, the defender’s purser, demanded his fare or a ticket. The pursuer in reply produced said receipt, explaining that that included his own fare. Lawson refused to accept this explanation, and without calling the captain or master, and making a demand for the fare through him, on the arrival of the steamer at Fort-William illegally, maliciously, and without probable cause, gave the pursuer in charge of a constable. . . . The pursuer was then taken in custody to the police-office at Fort-William, where he was detained for over half an hour and then liberated without any formal charge being made against him."

He also averred that on 24th August 1893 he had been subjected to a summary prosecution at the instance of the defender, under section 35 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862,* that he had been convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine of 5s., and that the whole of these proceedings were illegal. "They were carried out wilfully, maliciously, and without probable cause, to the loss and damage to the pursuer to the extent sued for."

He further stated that the conviction had been quashed on the 23d January 1894, on the ground that the complaint had been brought without the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal—21 R. (Just. Cases), 33.

The defender admitted that the pursuer contracted with the defender's agent at Oban for the carriage of a pony from Oban to Fort-William by the steamer "Chevalier." He denied that the pursuer was entitled to travel free, and stated,—“The pursuer was asked for his fare by the pursuer, but he refused, and had no money to pay it. His name and address were unknown to the pursuer, and also to the constable on the pier at Fort-William, but he said he was known to the inspector of police, and he offered to go to the inspector to be identified. He was accompanied there. He was not arrested nor detained. In the circumstances he might have been lawfully detained till tried, in terms of section 37 of the Act 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 63.”†

It was not disputed that the prosecution under the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act was instituted under the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864.

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer having suffered loss, injury, and damage through the action of the defender, or those for whom he is responsible, in having him wrongously arrested and imprisoned, and afterwards prosecuted and convicted, the defender is liable in damages therefor.

The defender pleaded ;—(1) That the pursuer's statements were irrelevant, and (4) that the action was excluded by section 35 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864.‡

* The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 63), enacts, sec. 35,—“The following offenders, that is to say, . . . (6) any person who travels or attempts to travel in any such steamer without having previously paid his fare, and with intent to avoid payment thereof . . . shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings ; but such liability shall not prejudice the recovery of any fare payable by him.”

† Sec. 37.—“It shall be lawful for the master or other officer of any duly surveyed passenger steamer, and for all persons called by him to his assistance, to detain any person who has committed any offence against any of the provisions of the two last preceding sections of this Act, and whose name and address are unknown to such officer, and to convey such offender with all convenient despatch before some Justice without any warrant or other authority than this Act ; and such Justice shall have jurisdiction to try the case, and shall proceed with all convenient despatch to the hearing and determining of the complaint against such offender.”

The pursuer proposed the issues quoted below.*

On 5th June 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) disallowed the second and third issues, and allowed the first issue, and appointed it to be the issue for the trial of the cause.†

Lundie v.
MacBrayne.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The action was barred in both its branches by the limitation clause (sec. 35) of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864. The apprehension was with a view to proceedings under the Summary Procedure Act. The first issue must charge malice and want of probable cause, as the pursuer was acting under warrant of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862, secs. 35 and 37,¹ but there could be no such thing as vicarious malice; the pursuer's own averments did not connect the malice with the present defender.² In the class of cases referred to in the Lord Ordinary's note, the proper criminal authorities

* “(1) Whether, on or about 10th August 1893, on board defender's steamer ‘Chevalier,’ at Fort-William, John James Lawson, an officer in the service of the defender, acting within the scope of his authority, wrongfully and oppressively caused the pursuer to be apprehended and taken in custody to the police-office at Fort-William, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? (2) Whether, on or about 19th August 1893, the defender, or someone in his employment, and for whom he is responsible, by presenting a complaint to the Sheriff-substitute at Fort-William wrongfully and illegally caused the pursuer to be brought before the Sheriff-substitute at Fort-William on 24th August 1893, and tried on a charge at defender's instance of having refused to pay his fare from Oban to Fort-William, and convicted and fined 5s., with instant execution by arrestment and poinding, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? (3) Whether, on or about 30th August 1893, the defender wrongfully and illegally caused the pursuer's pony to be poinded and sold by a sheriff-officer, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?”

† “OPINION.—With regard to the second and third issues proposed for the pursuer, the defender's plea, founded on the 35th section of the Summary Procedure Act, seems to me conclusive. Both issues relate to something done in a case instituted under that Act. No doubt it turned out that the case had been badly instituted, for want of the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal. But it was a proceeding under the Act all the same, and therefore this action, so far as these issues are concerned, comes too late.

“If the wrong complained of in the first issue had been that the defender's officer gave the pursuer into custody for committing an ordinary crime, it is clear that the defender would not have been responsible, and the officer himself could only have been made liable by its being shewn that he acted maliciously and without probable cause. But the apprehension of the pursuer took place in respect of an alleged offence against the 35th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1862, and by virtue of the powers conferred on the master and officers of a passenger steamer by section 37. Now, I cannot distinguish between an act of that kind done under statutory powers by the owner's representatives, and for his behoof, and the detention of a passenger by the servants of a railway company, for an alleged contravention of the company's bye-laws. In the latter class of cases the company has been held responsible on the principle of implied authority, because the servant is appointed to do that among other things, and if he makes a mistake the company must answer. The officer's authority is not very distinctly averred on record, but I think any omission on that score is supplied by the defender's admitted adoption of his act. It seems to me, therefore, that the first issue must be allowed.”

Argued for the pursuer;—Sec. 35 of the Summary Procedure Act did not apply to either branch of the case; the apprehension did not take place under that Act, and the prosecution was not protected by the Act, as it was null ab initio. The pursuer having acted in the commercial interests of his employer, the defender was liable for his fault.³ It was not necessary to prove malice.⁴ There could be no probable cause for the execution of an illegal warrant.⁵

LORD KINNEAR.—The pursuer of this action complains of two distinct and separate wrongs, for both of which he maintains that the defender is responsible. In the first place, he alleges that he was illegally apprehended by the order of a clerk in the defender's employment, acting within the scope of his authority; and in the second place, that he was wrongfully subjected to an illegal prosecution at the defender's instance, under which he was sentenced to pay a fine of five shillings.

The Lord Ordinary has allowed an issue to try the question raised by the first complaint, but he has held that in so far as the action is based on the second ground it is barred by a provision in the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, for the limitation of actions on account of anything done in any case instituted under the Act.

I think his Lordship's judgment on both points is right. It is not disputed that the prosecution of which the pursuer complains was instituted under the Summary Procedure Act. It was not the less a proceeding under the Act, because of the defective instance in respect of which the conviction was quashed. But the action was not brought within two months after the cause of action had arisen, and is therefore excluded by the 35th section of the statute. It is said that this plea excludes the action on all its grounds, but this appears to me untenable.

As regards the alleged illegal apprehension, the defence is twofold; it is said, in the first place, that the pursuer's averment is not true, and that what really happened was, that the pursuer having refused to pay his fare, and his name and address being unknown to the defender's pursuer, he voluntarily offered to go to the inspector of police at Fort-William, to whom he said that he was known, in order to be identified; that he was accompanied to the inspector's office, but was not arrested or detained. In the second place, it was argued that even if the pursuer's statement is correct in fact, his detention was justified by the 37th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1862, which prescribes the manner in which offenders against the 35th section may be apprehended. Now, that may be a perfectly good defence if the facts support it. But to give the defender the protection of that enactment it must be shewn, in the first place, either that the pursuer was travelling in his steamer without having previously paid his fare, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, or else that he had failed when required by an officer of the steamer either to pay his fare or to exhibit such ticket or other receipt as is usually given to persons travelling by the steamer, and paying their fare. Secondly, that his name and address were unknown to the officer who gave him in charge; and thirdly, that being apprehended he was conveyed with all convenient despatch before a Justice. But all of these propositions are contradicted by the pursuer, and therefore it appears to me that the defence on both grounds depends on matter of fact, which must be ascertained in the ordinary way before the law can be applied.

But then it is said that if the pursuer was wrongfully apprehended by the pursuer that officer must be liable for his own wrong, and that the defender is not responsible. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that in this respect the case is undistinguishable from those in which it has been held that railway companies are responsible for wrongful arrests made by their inspectors for offences against the Railway Acts or bye-laws authorised by these statutes. The case of Moore v. The Metropolitan Railway Co., L. R., 8 Q. B. 36, is an example. In that case a passenger travelling by the Metropolitan Railway from Moorgate Street to Notting Hill got out at Edgeware Road Station, which is a station short of Notting Hill. He was informed that he must pay an additional fare of twopence, which he refused to do unless a receipt were given him. He was thereupon given into custody by the inspector of the station on the charge of refusing to give up his ticket or pay his fare. The charge was dismissed, and the passenger brought an action of false imprisonment. It was held that as the railway company was empowered by the Railway Clauses Act to arrest persons committing frauds against the statute, and as the inspector was their representative at the station, it must be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that he had authority from the company to arrest persons committing offences against the statute, and that if such an officer intending to exercise his authority makes a mistake and does an act which cannot be justified, the company are responsible because he is their agent. The case establishes that two things must be proved in order to make a railway company or a shipping company liable for a wrongous apprehension by one of its officers. First, the offence must be one for which, if it had been committed, the company had power to arrest, because it is not to be presumed that the company have authorised one of their servants to apprehend a person whom they themselves had no power to apprehend; and secondly, that the officer was acting within the scope of his authority. As to the first point there is very little question in this case, because the defenders claim the right under the statute to apprehend a person in the position of this pursuer. One averment in the pursuer's condescendence might throw some doubt upon the second point, for he says the pursuer gave him in charge without having first appealed to the captain. If this means that the right to apprehend offenders rested with the captain and not with the pursuer, it might be difficult for the pursuer to shew that the pursuer acted within the scope of his authority. But I think that this is not a fair construction of the averments, and that fairly read they disclose a prima facie case to go to a jury.

The only remaining question is as to the terms of the issue. I do not think it necessary that the pursuer should take an issue of malice and want of pro-

No. 215. bable cause. The defender and his servants have no privilege to give persons into custody except that conferred by the statute, and he cannot plead the statute unless he has observed its conditions. He may have a good defence on the merits. But if he has not, it is no answer to the pursuer's complaint that his officer was not acting maliciously. On the other hand, I do not think the word "oppressively," which has been inserted in the issue, is apposite. In Mackay v. Grant, June 14, 1865, 3 Macph. 944, where an issue in these terms was allowed, the Lord Justice-Clerk said,—“Where wrongfully is combined with oppressively, I think it is open to the pursuer to proceed either upon want of legal warrant or upon the oppressive use of a warrant in itself legal.” In the present case I cannot see that the pursuer has alleged any case of oppression in addition to or distinct from the illegality of the arrest of which he complains. If he committed an offence against the statute for which the defender's officer was entitled to apprehend him, and if in making the apprehension the officer acted in accordance with the provisions of the statute and not otherwise, I see no case of oppression. I do not know what is meant by that word as used in this issue, and I think there would be a risk of its misleading the jury if it was allowed to remain.

July 20, 1894.
Lundie v.
MacBrayne.

I think the more appropriate form of issue is that approved in Pringle v. Bremner & Stirling, May 6, 1867, 5 Macph. (H. L.) 55, and I see no reason for departing from a style which has received the approval of the House of Lords.

I am of opinion, therefore, that we should affirm the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, but make this variation in the form of the issue.

LORD M'LAREN.—Judging from the narrative in this case, it would appear that some people imagine whenever they have been wronged they are entitled to hand over the person who has wronged them to a police-officer without a warrant.

I need hardly say that the constitution of this country confers no such right. It is a fundamental principle that no one can be deprived of his liberty or subjected to restraint without the warrant of a Judge or magistrate. An exception is admitted where the injured party has seen the crime committed, or has such evidence as is equivalent to personal observation. In that case he may detain the wrongdoer on condition of taking the person apprehended before a magistrate without delay, and he may, if necessary, call to his aid constables or officers of law.

This is not a case of a crime at common law, but an alleged contravention of a statute, and we must look at the statute to see the right of the person against whom the contravention has been committed. It is only where the address of the person alleged to have contravened the statute is unknown that his apprehension is authorised, and I think the pursuer is entitled to an issue of wrongful apprehension, because he avers that he, being a law-abiding citizen whose address was known to the officers of the steamer, was given into the custody of a police-officer by the defender's servant.

I agree with Lord Kinnear in his discussion of the authorities on this point, and also as to the form of issue which should be adopted.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

Agent and Client—Negligence—Employment—Right in security—Duty of law-agent to complete title.—In an action of damages brought in 1893 against a law-agent the pursuers averred that in 1852, when they were in minority, their father held a sum of money belonging to them; that without consulting them he borrowed this sum; that the pursuers' mother voluntarily offered to give security over certain heritable subjects belonging to her in which she was not infeft, that their father, as their curator, and their mother, instructed the defender to draw up a bond and disposition in security; that the defender prepared a bond and disposition in security, but did not complete the mother's title by infestment; that the pursuers did not know of the granting of the bond till 1889; that it was the defender's duty to complete the mother's title, and that his failure to do so had resulted in the loss of the sum borrowed.

Held that as the pursuers did not aver that the defender had been instructed to complete the mother's title, the action was not relevant.

ON 14th November 1893 John Auchincloss and his sister, Catherine Auchincloss or Smith, raised an action against Mr William Duncan, S.S.C., Edinburgh, for payment to them of £130.

1ST DIVISION.
 Ld. Wellwood.

They made the following statements: Under the trust-disposition of James Mowat, their maternal grandfather, who died in 1829, they had, along with a deceased sister, become entitled to three pro indiviso shares of the residue of his estate. In 1852 the value of these shares was £65. (Cond. 3) "On 13th April 1852, when the pursuers and their said now deceased sister were in minority, their father, without any consultation with them, borrowed the said amount of their shares of their grandfather's estate. He, however, as curator for the pursuers and their said sister, employed and instructed the defender to draw up a bond in favour of the pursuers and their said sister for the sum borrowed, and further, he and his wife directed the defender to prepare for behoof of the pursuers and their said sister, in security, a disposition of certain subjects at No. 71 Rose Street, Edinburgh, belonging to Mrs Auchincloss. The defender prepared a bond and disposition in security as directed, in favour of the pursuers and their said sister. The pursuers' father, in employing the defender to draw up the said deed, was acting as the natural guardian of the pursuers, and his instructions to the defender were given for and on behalf of the pursuers and their said sister." (Cond. 4) "It was the defender's duty, acting on behalf of the pursuers and their said sister, who were at the time minors, and utterly ignorant of what was being done with their money, to take care that a good title was obtained for them to the property disposed to them in security for the loan to their father. This he entirely failed to do. The pursuers' father did all he could to give the pursuers a proper security for the money he had borrowed. The property given in security was of adequate value, and the pursuers' failure to recover the sum due to them was attributable solely to the neglect and fault of the defender, as after mentioned."

Auchincloss v.
Duncan.

They then went on to recite the titles of the Rose Street property—
“In 1852, when the said bond and disposition in security was granted to the pursuers and their sister, their mother held the subjects disposed in security on a personal title only. . . . In these circumstances, it was the defender's duty to have the bond recorded in the Register of Sasines habili modo to create a real security in favour of the pursuers and their said sister. This he failed to do. The defender retained the bond, and also Mrs Auchincloss's titles to the subjects which she had assigned by the bond to the pursuers and their sister in his possession. By the bond Mrs Auchincloss bound herself to complete, at her expense, a title to the subjects.* The defender, though holding the titles, never completed Mrs Auchincloss's title, and in the beginning of 1860 he gave up the titles to Mr Auchincloss. The bond was not recorded at all until 12th November 1860, when the defender, as law-agent for the pursuers and their said sister, put it on the Register of Sasines, without any deed being on the said Register to shew the right of Mrs Auchincloss to the subjects she had disposed in security. Mrs Auchincloss continued to hold the subjects on a personal title from the date of the bond till 31 May 1860, when she sold them to William Findlay. . . .” It was only in February 1889 “that the pursuer John Auchincloss first came to know of the bond in his favour, and the other pursuer was not aware of it until even later.” Thereafter, in 1892, the pursuers took action to try and recover the amount of the bond from the persons who had come to be in possession of the security subjects, but without success.

“The defender, as law-agent employed for the pursuers, then minors, was under the obligation to see that the security granted for their money was made valid and effectual. This he failed to do. He first delayed for eight years to record the bond in the Register of Sasines, and then he recorded it ineptly. The pursuers have consequently lost the sum now sued for, through the negligence of the defender.”

The pursuers pleaded;—(3) The defender having been employed as law-agent on behalf of the pursuers by their natural guardians during their minority, is liable to them in damages for loss sustained by them in consequence of his failure to perform properly his duties in that capacity.

The defender pleaded;—(3) No relevant case stated. (6) The defender not having acted as agent for the pursuers, he ought to be assoilzied.

On 1st March 1894, the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) sustained the third plea in law for the defender, and dismissed the action.†

* The bond was produced. The only clause referring to the completing of the grantor's title was in these terms:—We “oblige ourselves, jointly and severally, for the expenses of completing the title of me, the said Rosina Mowat or Auchincloss, to the said subjects, and of granting and completing, assigning and discharging, this security, and on default in payment, grant power of sale.”

† “OPINION.— . . . In this action the pursuers seek to hold the defender, who is a Solicitor before the Supreme Courts, personally liable for alleged professional negligence, of which he is said to have been guilty upwards of forty years ago, in having failed to take care that a good title was obtained for them to certain heritable subjects for which a bond and disposition in security in their favour was granted by their father and mother in the year 1852. Amongst other defences, the defender pleads that the pursuers' averments are irrelevant, and also, (6) ‘That not having acted as agent for the pursuers, he ought to be assoilzied.’ I am of opinion that the pursuers have not relevantly averred that the defender was employed by them or on their behalf.

Mowat, the pursuers' maternal grandfather, to the children of the marriage between the pursuers' father and mother. The pursuers' father obtained possession of the shares which fell to the pursuers, and apparently used them for his own purposes. The pursuers' statement is that he borrowed the amount of their shares while they were in minority; but they also say, and that is part of their case, that they were not aware of this until recently, and that they were not consulted in the matter at all. When he thus appropriated,—I do not use the word in a bad sense,—or used the shares, the pursuers' father, being anxious that the pursuers should have some security for the money, instructed the defender to prepare a bond and disposition in security in their favour, over certain heritable subjects to which the pursuers' mother had right. The bond was prepared by the defender, and executed by Mr and Mrs Auchincloss. The complaint is that whereas Mrs Auchincloss held the subjects disposed in security on a personal title only, the defender failed to complete her title as he was bound to do, and did not even record the bond until November 1860, by which time the property had been sold by Mr and Mrs Auchincloss to a Mr Findlay; the result of which was that it was ultimately held by the Court that the bond gave the pursuers no real security over the subjects. I assume on the question of relevancy that the defender was negligent in the respects alleged.

“The question is whether the pursuers have relevantly averred that the defender was employed by them, or on their behalf; in other words, whether, in order to support an averment of employment by or on behalf of a minor, it is relevant and sufficient to aver that the agent was instructed to do the work in question by the minor's curator, without the minor's knowledge, and for the purpose of giving security for a sum of money belonging to the minor, the use of which the curator had taken also without the minor's knowledge and permission.

“I do not think that such an averment is relevant. The powers of a father as administrator-in-law for his children are not in this respect different from those of any other guardian. A minor acts with consent of his curator, the curator cannot act by himself without the minor. Further, a curator cannot legally lend the curatorial funds to himself. Therefore, when Mr Auchincloss instructed the defender to prepare the bond, it cannot be said with propriety that he gave instructions for and on behalf of the pursuers, in the sense that in so doing he was acting as their curator. He was really acting as their debtor, and endeavouring to give them security for the money of which he had taken the use without their knowledge.

“If it had been averred that the pursuers' father employed the defender with their knowledge and consent, there might have been a case for inquiry. But the pursuers' case is that they knew nothing about it,—that they were kept in the dark. There is thus no room for implying authority from them to employ the defender. Such implied authority is negatived by their own statement.

“No doubt the defender was employed to prepare the bond for their benefit, but that is not enough. It was necessary that the pursuers should aver and prove that the defender was employed by them, or by their authority. This is clearly settled by the decision of the House of Lords in the leading case of Robertson v. Fleming, 4 Macq. 167. In that case there were facts alleged which apparently warranted an issue as to whether the agent was employed by or by the authority of the appellants. This appears from the terms of the judgment and remit, 4 Macq. 214. But the facts alleged were very different from those stated in the present case. A person named Hamilton, being desirous to raise money, applied for an advance to certain money-lenders, who agreed to make it on the borrower obtaining three cautioners. The three respondents agreed to become cautioners, being aware that Hamilton had leasehold property which, if properly secured for their benefit, would keep them safe. Their statement was that Hamilton agreed to complete the necessary

Argued for the pursuers;—The pursuers' averments were to the effect that the defender was to prepare the necessary deeds, and it was his duty therefore to prepare a good security. That was a matter entirely in his hands. It did not matter that the mother was not a debtor in the loan; so far as the grantees were concerned, the transaction was onerous. It was of no importance who conveyed the instructions to the law-agent¹. Besides it was sufficiently alleged that the father was acting for behoof of—that was, for the benefit and by the authority of—the pursuers, in instructing the defender. The latter was the family agent, and knew the whole circumstances.

Argued for the defender;—The Lord Ordinary's reading of the record was right, viz., that the instructions were given by the father on his own account, and not by the authority of the pursuers, who indeed stated that they knew nothing about the transaction at the time. That being so, the defender was not employed by them, and they had no title to sue. Besides, the mother, to whom the lands belonged, was not debtor in the loan. She was not bound to interpose at all, and it was not said that she had done more than direct the defender to prepare a disposition of the subjects, i.e., as she held them. The defender was not entitled—far less bound—to go beyond his instructions, and take steps to complete her title.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—In this case the pursuers, who sue in the character of creditors in a debt due by their father, claim damages from their father's solicitor on the ground of professional negligence, in that the defender being employed by the father to prepare a deed of security in their favour, failed to perfect the title by sasine.

The Lord Ordinary has held, following the case of Robertson v. Fleming, 4 Macqueen, 167, that the action fails for want of relevancy, because it is not averred that the defender was employed by the pursuers (that is, the minor children of the debtor) or by their authority.

In such a case, if a father is under an obligation to grant a good security to his children, and is in circumstances which enable him to fulfil that obligation, I cannot doubt that his authority as administrator-in-law for his children would security over this property, and that he employed Robertson, the agent, for their behoof. The issue sent to the jury was whether Robertson was employed by Hamilton 'for behoof of' the cautioners. The House of Lords held that the issue was improperly worded, on the ground that the words 'for behoof of' meant 'for the benefit of,' and were not equivalent to the words 'by the authority of.'

"Now, in the present case, as I read the pursuers' averments, it cannot be inferred from them that the defender was employed by them, or by their authority; and on that short ground I think the case must be dismissed.

"It appears from the pursuers' own statement that the value of the three pro indiviso shares belonging to them and their sister was only £65, and I think the probability is that much more than that small sum was expended by the pursuers' father on their upkeep and education."

extend to the giving the necessary authority to a solicitor to see to his children's interests in the matter, and to take care that they got a good security. In the case supposed the solicitor has the authority of the children, as well as of the parent, to act for them; and he would, of course, be responsible to the children in case of negligence resulting in loss to them. If the action is not relevantly laid it is only because it is not distinctly averred that the father's instructions to his solicitor were given in the exercise of his powers as their administrator-in-law.

Duncan.

As the record stands, and in the absence of any offer of amendment, I do not dissent from the Lord Ordinary's view. But there is another defence, a defence of a more substantial character, on which I should prefer to rest my opinion. The averments in cond. 3 are (1) that the defender was employed "to draw up a bond in favour of the pursuers and their sister," and (2) that he was employed "to prepare for behoof of the pursuers and their sister a disposition of certain subjects" (described) belonging to Mrs Auchincloss, the pursuer's mother. It is further explained that at the time when these instructions were given the title to the subjects to be conveyed in security was incomplete, and it is not averred either that the defender was instructed to pass infeftment on the disposition in security, or to complete the title of Mrs Auchincloss, without which completion an infeftment of the disponent in security would of course be unavailing.

This point, however, has not escaped the attention of the pursuers' advisers.

Being unable (as I assume) consistently with the facts of the case to aver that the defender was instructed to perfect the security, it is set forth in cond. 4 that it was the defender's professional duty (that is, independent of instructions) to perfect the security. Now, I am unable to follow the pursuers in this statement or deduction from the facts of the case as set forth by themselves. The property to be disposed in security was the property of Mrs Auchincloss, who is not said to have been a debtor in the obligation, and she was under no obligation to complete her title and to pass infeftment in favour of her disponents. A person who interposes as a cautioner may mean to give a perfect or an imperfect security, but if he or she instructs a solicitor to prepare a deed of security which still leaves the granter a certain control over an estate, I know of no rule of law which would require the solicitor to perfect the security without instructions from his client or even justify him in so doing. In the present case we have no reason to know that Mrs Auchincloss would have agreed to infeft her children in her property in security of her husband's obligations, and her solicitor clearly had no right to pass infeftment without instructions from his client. It may be said that the disposition was a very poor security unless infeftment passed upon it. That may be, but a debtor who takes security from a cautioner must be content with such security as the cautioner is willing to give. I think we should adhere to the interlocutor.

No. 217. HONOURABLE JAMES M. O. BYNG AND ANOTHER (Lucas's Trustees), Pursuers (Respondents).—W. C. Smith—Sym.

Lucas's Trustees v. Campbell and Scott. Defenders (Reclaimers).—Johnston—Macfarlane.

Arrestment and furthcoming—Arrestment of joint property—Summons of furthcoming—Conclusions—Competency—Process.—Under the lease of a quarry the plant was declared to be the joint property of the landlord and of the tenant, the landlord being bound to pay one-half of the value thereof to the tenant at the ish of the lease. Certain creditors of the landlord, before the lease ended, used arrestments in the hands of the tenant. Thereafter they raised an action of furthcoming against the arrestee and the landlord's trustee, in which they alleged that the plant in the quarries had been attached, the conclusion being that the arrestee should be ordained to pay the whole debt due by the landlord or such part thereof as was represented by money arrested in his hands due by him to the landlord, and that such other orders should be pronounced as "may seem necessary for satisfying the said claim of the pursuers."

The Court being of opinion that the summons contained no conclusions under which the arrestments, even if competently laid on, could be made available, allowed the pursuers an opportunity of amending the same.

The pursuers thereupon substituted for the original conclusions the following—that the Court should ordain the moveable plant to be sold, and the price thereof, so far as was necessary for the satisfaction of their debt, paid to them, or otherwise to pronounce a like order, upon the pursuers paying to the arrestee half the value of the moveable plant as the same might be ascertained in terms of the lease.

Held that the conclusions were not tenable, and that the interest of the landlord in the plant had not been validly attached by the arrestment.

Per Lord Kinnear—"An arrestment and forthcoming is an adjudication preceded by an attachment, and the essential part of the diligence is the adjudication. It follows that an arrestment is futile unless it can be followed up and the diligence worked out by a decree effectually transferring from the common debtor to the arresting creditor the obligation which was originally prestable to the former by the arrestee."

1st Division.
Lord Kinnearney.

THE trustees of the late Sir George de la Poer Beresford of Ballachulish granted a lease in favour of Dr Donald Campbell, from 1878, for fifteen years, running until Whitsunday 1893, of the Ballachulish slate quarries. The lease contained the following clause:—"Further, the said Donald Campbell having paid to the said first party [the trustees] the sum of £3792, 8s. sterling, being one-half the amount of valuation of the engines, waggons, drums, rails, tools, horses, carts, and other moveable plant for the said quarries . . . the same shall be held to be the joint property of the proprietors and tenant" (then followed a provision for renewing plant from time to time at the cost of both parties equally); "and the said first party or their foresaids shall be bound, at the termination of this lease, to pay to the said Donald Campbell or his foresaids one-half of the value of the engines, waggons, drums, rails, tools, horses, carts, and other moveable plant and stock of slates which may then be on said quarries."

In December 1891 the Hon. James M. O. Byng and another, Admiral Lucas's marriage-contract trustees, as assignees of a £10,000 bond in security over the lands of Ballachulish granted in 1879 by Sir George Beresford, raised an action for payment of the amount of the bond against Ebenezer Erskine Scott, C.A., trustee under a trust-deed granted by Sir George Beresford. Decree was obtained in the action in June 1892, and extracted on 16th August 1892.

* Decided June 22, 1894.

On 3d December 1891 the pursuers in that action used arrestments on the dependence to the extent of £15,200 in the hands of Dr Donald Campbell, lessee of the slate quarries.

On 18th May 1893 the trustees further arrested £15,000 in the hands of Dr Campbell, proceeding on the decree they had obtained.

On 31st May 1893 they raised an action of furthcoming against Dr Campbell as arrestee, and against Mr Scott, as trustee foresaid, as principal debtor under the bond. The conclusions of the summons were:—"Therefore the defender, Donald Campbell, in whose hands arrestments have been used, ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree of the Lords of our Council and Session, to make payment and delivery to the pursuers of the sum of £15,000, or such other sum or sums as may be owing by him to the defender Ebenezer Erskine Scott, as trustee foresaid, and arrested in his hands upon 3d day of December 1891, and upon the 18th day of May 1893, at the instance of the pursuers, or at least of such part thereof as shall satisfy and pay the pursuers the principal sum of £10,000," with interest, . . . "all as decerned for in an interim decree obtained," &c., dated at Edinburgh, the 29th day of June 1892, and extracted the 16th day of August 1892; and such further orders for production, delivery, inspection, sale, consignment, and payment with reference to the goods or property of said Ebenezer Erskine Scott in the possession of the defender Donald Campbell, should be pronounced by our Lordships as may seem necessary for satisfying the said claim of the pursuers."

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 4) "The said lease terminated at Whitsunday 1893, and there is now in the possession of the said arrestee, the defender Donald Campbell, a large quantity of valuable plant, consisting of engines, waggons, drums, rails, tools, horses, and carts connected with the working of the quarry, which plant is the property of the principal debtor, and which the arrestee is under obligation to deliver to the principal debtor. In terms of said lease the tenant was bound to deliver the plant to the proprietor at the term of Whitsunday 1893, and the defender Scott was bound to make certain payments in respect thereof." (Cond. 6) " . . . Under the said arrestment the foresaid plant in the quarries of Ballachulish was attached. The plant is now and has since the commencement of the lease been wholly in the possession of, and subject to the control of, the defender Campbell." (Cond. 7) "The said arrestee Dr Campbell refuses to make payment to the pursuers of the sums in his hands arrested as condescended on, and the present action has been rendered necessary in order to make the said sums forthcoming to the pursuers."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—" (1) The pursuers having arrested in the hands of the arrestee the sums owing, or goods and gear deliverable by him to the principal debtor, they are entitled to have the same made furthcoming in satisfaction of their debt, to the extent due by the arrestee to the principal debtor. (5) On a sound construction of the said lease, the plant connected with the quarries at the termination of the lease was the property of the lessor."

Answers were lodged for both defenders, in which it was explained that the plant in the quarries was not attached by the arrestments. They averred that the plant was the joint property of Dr Campbell, the tenant of the quarries, and of Mr Scott, the trustee, and did not form part of the subjects let to Dr Campbell. Also, that although the original lease expired at Whitsunday 1893, by agreement between the parties in November 1891, it had been extended until Whitsunday 1894.

The defenders pleaded;—" (1) The averments of the pursuers being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed. (2) The arrestee not having had in his hands

 July 20, 1894. Lucas's Trustees v. Campbell and Scott. Upon 5th December 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Having considered the cause, finds that the pursuers have competently arrested the right to the sole property of the plant referred to on record, arising to the common debtor at the close of the lease between his predecessors in the lands therein mentioned and the arrestee, in terms of the provisions of the lease libelled: Before further answer, allows to the defenders a proof of the averments in answer 4, to the effect that the lease in question was extended from Whitsunday 1893 to Whitsunday 1894, and appoints the same to proceed on a day to be afterwards fixed.”*

* “OPINION.—This is an action of furthcoming, signeted on 31st May 1893, based on two arrestments, the one dated 3d December 1891, used on the dependence of an action raised by the present pursuers, trustees of Admiral and Mrs Lucas against Ebenezer Erskine Scott, C.A., trustee for Sir George de la Poer Beresford, and another dated 18th May 1893, proceeding on an extract-decret obtained in that action. The arrestments were used in the hands of Dr Donald Campbell, and this action is brought against Mr Scott as common debtor and Dr Campbell as arrestee, and is defended by both.

“By lease dated in 1878 the then trustees of Sir George de la Poer Beresford, with consent of the beneficiaries under his trust-deed, let to Dr Campbell the slate quarries of Ballachulish for fifteen years from Whitsunday 1878, the ish of the lease being Whitsunday 1893.

“The lease contains the following provision in regard to the plant of the quarry—(Quoted supra, p. 1096.)

“The pursuers maintained that the plant in the quarry has been arrested by both arrestments, and that since the commencement of the lease it has been wholly in the possession of Dr Campbell, and subject to his control. They have pleaded,—‘(1) The pursuers having arrested in the hands of the arrestee the sums owing or goods and gear deliverable by him to the principal debtor, they are entitled to have the same made furthcoming in satisfaction of their debt to the extent due by the arrestee to the principal debtor.’

“The defenders plead that there were not in the hands of the arrestee at the date of the arrestments any arrestable funds or goods belonging to the common debtor, and that the action should therefore be dismissed.

“The first question then is, were the arrestments competent and effectual? In considering this question it does not seem to me to be necessary to distinguish between the two arrestments. Either, if competent and effectual, might be a good warrant for this action of furthcoming, and the defenders' objections are common to both. The pursuers say that the later arrestment was used ob majorem cautelam.

“The pursuers maintained that it resulted from a sound construction of the lease that the plant was truly the property of the landlord, and not at all the property of the tenant; and that therefore being moveable property, belonging to the common debtor in the possession of the tenant, it was duly arrested in his possession.

“I cannot assent to that argument. The deed declares expressly that the plant shall be during the lease the joint property of the landlord and the tenant. There is not the slightest reason to suggest that the parties designed to conceal their true relations or to make them appear other than they really were. It was competent for them to contract that the plant should be joint property. They have contracted to that effect expressly, and there seems no reason why the words of the contract should not receive the effect according to their unambiguous meaning.

“The pursuers further maintained, that supposing the plant to be at the date of the arrestment the joint property of the landlord and tenant, it was competent to arrest it. I do not think that it can be asserted as an abstract and general proposition that it is competent for the creditor of one of two joint owners of

The defenders reclaimed, and argued that the action was irrelevant and incompetent, on the ground, inter alia, that the summons contained no effective conclusion for working out the diligence of arrestment. No. 217.

The pursuers maintained that the arrestments were valid for the reasons stated by the Lord Ordinary, and that in the circumstances the second conclusion [printed in italics, p. 1097] was competent and effectual to work out the diligence. July 20, 1894. Lucas's Trustees v. Campbell and Scott.

moveable property to arrest the subjects of that joint property, or even the interests of his debtor in that property, and to bring it to sale by means of a forthcoming. It is true that it has been held competent to arrest shares in a joint stock company—Sinclair v. Staples, Jan. 27, 1860, 22 D. 600. But in that case the shares of the common debtor could be brought to a sale without affecting the interests of the other shareholders. In the present case I am unable to see how any one article of the plant in this quarry could be brought to a sale if the whole stipulation of the parties had been that it should be joint property. It would not be possible to sell any part of the property of Dr Campbell in order to pay the debts of Beresford's trustee. In Fleming v. Twaddle, Dec. 2, 1828, 7 S. 92, it was held incompetent to poind joint property for the individual debt of one of the joint owners; and it must, I think, be equally incompetent to arrest it and follow out the arrestment by a forthcoming and sale.

"But then it is provided by the contract that at the termination of the lease the landlords (that is now Mr Scott as Beresford's trustee) should pay to Dr Campbell one half of the value of the plant 'which may then be on said quarries.' The contract contains no express provision that the plant should on such payment become the property of the landlord; but I think that such a declaration may, and indeed must of necessity be inferred. The contract therefore is so conceived as to eventuate, if its stipulations are duly carried out, in this, that the plant which before the termination of the lease was the joint property of the landlord and tenant shall then, on the stipulated payment by the landlord, become the sole property of the landlord, and that the tenant shall then be bound to deliver the plant to the landlord, or rather shall leave it on the landlord's property, and shall himself quit the occupation of the property and the possession of the plant; and the difficult and somewhat novel question of law arises—Is this right of the landlord so resulting from the stipulations of the contract an arrestable right? If it is, then I apprehend it has been arrested. I think the first plea in law for the pursuers sufficiently, although not very aptly, expresses the pursuers' contention that this ultimate right of the landlord has been arrested.

"The right thus sought to be arrested was not at the date of either arrestment a right prestable to the landlord. But it is established that a personal interest may be arrested although no sum be payable on account of it at the date of the arrestment. The contents of a policy of insurance were held validly attached by an arrestment used between the date of the last premium paid and the death of the person insured—Strachan v. McDougle, June 9, 1835, 13 S. 954. Again, Lord Gifford as Lord Ordinary in Bankhardt's Trustees v. Scottish Amicable Society and Duncan, Jan. 21, 1871, 9 Macph. 443, held that an arrestment of a policy of insurance used in the hands of the insurance company during the life of the person insured was effectual although a period for payment of the premium had intervened between the date of the arrestment and the date of the forthcoming, and he found that the arresters were entitled to have the principal debtor's interest in the policy sold and the price made forthcoming. So, bills on a third party, for which the holder is accountable to the common debtor, are arrestable before the bills have been paid—Gordon v. Innes, Feb. 3, 1740, M. 715; Lothian v. McCree, Feb. 27, 1828, 7 S. 72. On the same principle rents and annuities are arrestable currente termino.

"A case still more in point is Marshall v. Nimmo, Dec. 18, 1847, 10 D. 328. There the creditor of a slater, who had contracted to slate a roof for the arrestee, was held entitled to arrest the sum which would fall due under the contract, although it was not then due, and might not become due at all, as for example, if the slater had not performed his contract. Here the right of the common debtor was held arrestable although not then prestable, and although contingent and indeed dependent on the actings of the common debtor. That case is closely applicable. But in it the eventual right of the common debtor under the contract was for a sum of money, and here it is for certain moveable property. That, I think, makes no difference.

No. 217. At advising (upon 16th February 1894),—

"The defenders maintained that furniture or plant belonging to a landlord was not arrestable in the hands of a tenant, but was capable of being attached by poinding, and they quoted the case of Davidson v. Murray, Dec. 18, 1784, M. 761, which at first sight appears to decide that furniture in possession of a tenant could not be arrested by the creditors of the owners of the furniture. The pursuer maintained that the case was not good law, and had not been followed. But it is quoted both by Erskine and Bell without disapproval. I do not, however, think that it decided that point. The common debtor was tenant of a house, and the arrestee was his subtenant, and the furniture of the common debtor was let to the arrestee along with the house. The arrestments were used after the principal lease had expired, and therefore after the sublease had fallen with it, and the arrestee was therefore possessing the house and furniture precariously, without any title, and under no contract, and in these circumstances it was held that the furniture must be regarded as really in the possession of the common debtor, but the case does not, in my opinion, decide that furniture possessed under a lease would not be arrestable.

"The present case presents the further peculiarity that according to the conception of the contract, the same event which converts the joint right to the plant into a sole right in the landlord also determines the possession of the tenant, and it may be that arrestments of the plant on the ground used on the expiry of the lease would be bad, and that then poinding would at that time be the appropriate diligence on the authority of Murray v. Davidson, because then the plant would be no longer in the possession of Dr Campbell under a contract, so that it was argued that as the plant could not be arrested before the expiry of the lease because it was joint property, nor after the expiry of the lease because it then ceased to be in the possession of the tenant, it could not be arrested at all. I think this difficulty is met by the consideration that the diligence of arrestment attaches a right in the person of the arrestee at its date, not a right, or money, or a moveable coming into his hands afterwards. It is effectual at the very first, or not at all. In this case the arrestments cannot correctly be said to have attached the plant either at the date of the arrestments or at the close of the lease. What they did attach was the obligation by Dr Campbell to leave the whole plant for the landlord at the end of the lease, an obligation existing at the date of the arrestments, and, as I think, attached by them.

"I am therefore prepared to find that the arrestments used were habile to attach the claim to the sole property of the plant arising to the common debtor at the close of the lease.

"But the defenders have averred that in November 1891—that is, before either arrestment—the lease was extended by agreement for the year from Whitsunday 1893 to Whitsunday 1894. It was maintained on the one hand that this was an averment of a lease for a year, capable of being proved by parole, and, on the other hand, that being a contract regarding heritage, and differing from the ordinary case of a yearly lease, it could not be constituted or proved without writing.

"I can see no good ground for holding that the ordinary rule that a lease for one year may be proved by parole should not apply in this case. I think that the peculiarity of the case, or what is unusual in it, namely, that the lease agreed on was not to commence for more than a year after the agreement, does not affect the mode of proving it. And although it was maintained that the averments were too vague and indefinite to be admitted to proof, I am of opinion that a proof cannot be refused on that ground.

"It appears to me therefore to be necessary, first of all, to ascertain what is which the pursuers allege that they have effectually attached certain machinery and plant belonging to the common debtor in the possession of Donald Campbell, the arrestee. It is not alleged that the arrestee is indebted to the common debtor in any sum of money, or that anything has been attached by the arrestments excepting the machinery and plant in question. The arrestee was tenant of the slate quarries of Ballachulish belonging to the trust-estate of the late Sir George Beresford, which is now held by the defender Mr Ebenezer Erskine Scott as trustee. The lease was granted for a term of fifteen years, which expired at Whitsunday 1893. It is provided by this lease that inasmuch as the tenant Donald Campbell had paid to the landlord one-half of the amount of the valuation of the engines and other moveable plant for the quarries, the same should be "held to be the joint property of the proprietors and the tenant," and that at the termination of the lease the proprietor should be bound to pay to the tenant one-half of the value of the moveable plant and stock of slates which may then be in the quarries. On the construction of this clause the Lord Ordinary has held that on the termination of the lease, and on the stipulated payment being made by the landlord, the plant and stock will become the sole property of the landlord, and must be delivered to him or left on the ground by the outgoing tenant, and that the landlord's right to acquire this property on the stipulated condition is arrestable, and has been effectually arrested. I do not express any opinion on these questions at present, because assuming the arrestment to be valid, the summons contains no conclusion which it is possible for the Court to sustain. The purpose of an action for furthcoming is to make the debts or goods which have been arrested available for payment of the debt, and the summons contains no effective conclusion for that purpose. The only operative conclusion is for payment of £15,000, or such other sum as may be due by the arrestee to the common debtor. But a decree for payment of money is out of the question unless the property which is said to have been arrested shall first be converted into money. The law is very clearly stated in Sinclair v. Staples, 22 D. 600. Every species of moveable property may be validly arrested provided the diligence can be effectually worked out. But in order that that may be done the summons of furthcoming must be so framed as to be applicable to the specific subjects attached by the diligence. It may be that in the ordinary case when corporeal moveables have been arrested, a warrant of sale may be granted, although there is no specific conclusion for sale in the summons. But that proceeds, as Lord Stair explains (iii. l. 38), on the assumption of the arrestee's offer of the goods ipsa corpora in order that he may not be "decerned for making furthcoming a liquid sum for the price." And therefore assuming that a warrant for sale might be granted as a matter of course, where the arrestee has no interest in the goods arrested, but is under an absolute obligation to make them over ipsa corpora to the common debtor, it is obvious that the same procedure canthe true ish of this lease. If it shall turn out to be Whitsunday 1893, then the furthcoming will proceed in the ordinary way. But if it shall be found that the ish has been postponed till Whitsunday 1894, I think that it will not on that account be necessary to dismiss this action as premature, but that it will be sufficient to sist it until the lease shall come to an end.

"It was suggested in argument that the lease might be continued from year to year for an indefinite period. No further extension, however, has been made, and it will be time enough to consider the effect of such an extension of the lease when it is made, when it will fall to be considered whether such an extension of the lease could be allowed to defeat the pursuers' arrestments. . . ."

No. 217. not be followed in a case like the present, where the method of working out the diligence is not fixed by practice. The machinery which is said to have been arrested is at present the joint property of the arrestee and the common debtor, and therefore the pursuer must work out his diligence in such a manner as to make his debtor's interest available without prejudice to the rights of his co-owner. It may be that, as the Lord Ordinary has held, the arrestee's interest may be determined so that the machinery will become the sole property of the common debtor. But then the arrestee is under no obligation to make over the property except upon condition of receiving payment of half the value. It appears to me, therefore, that in order that the arrested moveables may be made available for paying the debts of the common debtor, it is necessary that the common property should be severed, and also that the arrestee's right to half the value of the property should be satisfied; there can be no furthcoming unless these conditions have been satisfied, or otherwise unless the decree contains provision for their satisfaction. It may or may not be that the interests of parties might be adjusted upon a sale, and consequent division of the price. I express no opinion upon that point, but it is obvious that the arrestee has a material interest. But if the pursuer had desired a sale, his summons should have contained a conclusion to that effect, either in absolute terms, if that be his right, or subject to such conditions as he may be able to formulate for securing the rights of the arrestee from prejudice. The only conclusion he adds to that for payment of money is—"And such further orders for production, delivery, inspection, sale, consignment, and payment with reference to the goods or property of said Ebenezer Erskine Scott in the possession of the defender Donald Campbell should be pronounced by your Lordships as may seem necessary for satisfying the said claim of the pursuers." Now, if that means that the Court is to find out the proper order, and give any form of decree that may be effectual, I think it is an incompetent conclusion. The pursuer must formulate his demand, and express in terms the specific decree he asks. I think the summons as it stands must be dismissed, but if the pursuer thinks he can frame a conclusion which would be at once effectual and admissible as an amendment, I think he should be allowed an opportunity of doing so.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

The pursuers thereafter amended the record by substituting for the first part printed above in italics the following:—"Therefore the Lords of our Council and Session should decern and ordain the whole moveable plant, goods, and gear arrested in the hands of the defender Donald Campbell by virtue of arrestments dated 3d December 1893 and 18th May 1893, at the instance of the pursuers, being the plant referred to in the lease mentioned in the condescendence, to be exposed to public roup at the sight of the Sheriff-substitute at Fort-William, or such other person as the said Lords may appoint, and the price thereof paid and delivered over to the pursuers, or at least such part of said price, etc." And for the second part printed in italics the following:—"Or otherwise, and as alternative to the conclusion last above written, upon payment by the pursuers to the said defender Donald Campbell of one-half of the value of the said moveable plant, goods, and gear, as the same may be ascertained in terms of the lease mentioned in the condescendence, our said Lords ought and should decern and ordain the said moveable plant, goods, and gear to be exposed to public roup at sight as aforesaid, and the price thereof, after repayment to the pursuers of the said one-half of the value of the said plant, to be paid and delivered over to the pursuers, or at least such part thereof as shall pay to them the foresaid sum of £10,000 with the said interest."

They also added to cond. 6 the following:—"The pursuers are willing, in the event of its being held that they are not entitled to have the said plant sold and the price paid over to them in terms of the first conclusion of the summons as amended, to make payment to the arrestee of one-half of the value of said plant (as determined in terms of the lease), the said one-half of the value of said plant to be repaid to the pursuers out of the first proceeds of the sale, and the remainder of the said proceeds to be applied, so far as necessary, to their said debt of £10,000 with interest. It is explained that the whole plant referred to in the lease is in fact moveable, and is so described in the lease"; and added the following pleas in law,—“(6) In any event, the pursuers are entitled to decree of forthcoming on making payment to the arrestee of one-half the value of the plant. (7) On making payment to the arrestee as aforesaid the pursuers are entitled to repayment of the said half the value of the plant out of the first proceeds of the plant when sold.”

The defenders maintained that the conclusions of the summons as amended were incompetent.

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—When this case was last before us the pursuers were allowed to amend their summons, because while we thought that the summons as it stood could not be sustained, we were not prepared to say there was no possible method of making the arrestee's obligation to his creditor prestable to the arresting creditor, while the pursuers undertook to formulate a decree which might be effectual for that purpose. In support of the amended summons the pursuers' counsel repeated an argument which we had already rejected, that they were entitled to a judgment as to the validity of the attachment effected by the arrestment irrespective of the validity of the conclusions of the summons. This appears to me to be a misconception of the legal character of arrestments in execution. An arrestment and forthcoming is an adjudication preceded by an attachment, and the essential part of the diligence is the adjudication. It follows that an arrestment is futile unless it can be followed up and the diligence worked out by a decree effectually transferring from the common debtor to the arresting creditor the obligation which was originally prestable to the former by the arrestee. The proceedings for this purpose may vary according to the nature of the debt which is said to have been arrested, but if there be any question whether a future and conditional obligation can be arrested or not, it is essential for the arresting creditor to shew that the diligence can be effectually worked out by means of a decree. Therefore, because the argument had not been directed to this point, which appears to me to be the crucial point of the case, we gave the parties an opportunity of being further heard, and allowed the pursuers, for the purpose of argument, to formulate the decree to which they claim to be entitled.

The pursuers now proposed to amend their summons by substituting two conclusions for those of the original action. But after the amendment had been allowed, certain proceedings have taken place which were not anticipated and the effect of which may possibly be to embarrass the pursuers in argument, although I think they may also serve the purpose of clearing the question by directing the argument to the proper point. In ordinary course we should have expected the pursuers to table their amendment at once, so that the question might be finally argued before the determination of the lease, and no doubt that would have been the course which the pursuers would have desired to follow. But then it appears that it was for the interest of all parties, who are equally interested in getting the highest attainable value for the machinery and plant to which their arrestment applies, that arrangements should be made for handing over the plant to a new tenant. We were therefore asked, instead of disposing of the action as it stood, to allow the arrestments to be recalled in the meantime upon certain conditions which would reserve all questions as to the validity of the diligence, and also secure the rights of parties according to their ultimate determination. Now, that was allowed on these conditions, but the defenders, who asked the diligence to be recalled, appear to have been advised that it was unnecessary to follow that course. Accordingly, they did not comply with the conditions, and the arrestments stand now in exactly the same position as if no provisional order for their recall had been given. But then, in the meantime the defenders had themselves proceeded in a manner which is said to alter the position of parties. The lease has come to an end; the tenant in whose hands the arrestment was used has gone away, his claim against his landlord being satisfied, and the new tenant, as I understand, is now in possession, and therefore the position of the subjects with reference to which the action relates is materially altered. But then I think the pursuers are quite entitled to say that the validity of their action must be determined irrespective of this change of circumstances, and that we are to consider the conclusions which they now propose as amended upon exactly the same conditions as if the action had been heard before the termination of the lease, and while the machinery and plant in question were still in the undisturbed possession of the tenant.

Considering the question, therefore, from that point of view, we are to say whether the conclusions which the pursuers now propose to substitute for their original conclusions are tenable or not. It appears to me to be clear that the first of this set of alternative conclusions could never have been sustained, because by that conclusion the pursuer asks that there shall be an immediate decree for exposing to public roup the whole moveable plant, goods, and gear which are said to have been arrested in the hands of the defender Donald Campbell. Now, that is to be an immediate decree irrespective of the conditions of the lease, and irrespective of any conditions whatever for protecting the rights and interests of the arrestee. At the time the arrestments were used the moveable plant and machinery in question were not the property of the common debtor, but were the joint property of the common debtor and the arrestee; and therefore what is proposed is to carry off and sell as for the debt of the common debtor property which is not his exclusive property at all, but is the joint property of himself and of his tenant. That appears to me to be plainly, and on the face of it, quite untenable. An arrestment can never in any way prejudice the rights and interests of the arrestee. It can do nothing but enable the arresting creditor to enforce against the arrestee the obligations which are prestable from him to the common debtor, and to found upon that as giving the arresting creditor a right which would override the separate and independent right of the arrestee in goods belonging either jointly or solely to himself is quite out of the question.

But then, having no doubt that difficulty in view, the pursuers propose an alternative conclusion, by which they undertake to protect the rights and interests of the arrestee, their alternative conclusion being, that upon payment by them to the arrestee of one-half of the value of the moveable plant, goods, and gear in question, as the same may be ascertained in terms of the lease, then there shall be an order for exposing the whole of these goods and plant to public auction. Now, it appears to me that both branches of this conclusion raise very serious difficulty. In the first place, the conclusion assumes that the pursuers' right depends upon the performance of a certain condition, and I cannot see how that condition could possibly be purified by the operation of any decree of this Court, or otherwise than by the will and good pleasure of the arrestee. Now, the validity of an arrestment cannot possibly depend upon the will of the arrestee. But the right of the arrestee under his lease is to obtain payment, not of one-half of any price that may be fetched by a sale of the moveable portion of the plant, but of one-half of the value of the entire plant, whether fixed or moveable in situ as the plant of a going concern. The defenders say that part of the plant now in question is heritable, and that part of it is moveable. If that be so, the pursuers do not claim to have attached the heritable portion of the machinery and plant by their diligence, and they very properly confine the conclusion of their summons to the moveable plant. But then that means that before the tenant's right to obtain payment of one-half of the value of the entire plant can be set aside there is to be a severance of the moveable from the fixed portion, and that he is to have one-half of the value of the moveable portion, the pursuers leaving him to recover, as best he can, the value of the other portion from his debtor. If, therefore, it were conceded that part of the plant is heritable, I should see very great difficulty in working out this conclusion without the consent of the arrestee. If it is not conceded, then it would be necessary that we should have an inquiry, and the arrestee would have to be kept out of his money until the termination of a litigation in which he has no interest.

No. 217.
Lucas's Trustees v. Campbell and Scott.

Apart from both of these difficulties, which appear to me to be considerable, I am unable to see how we could compel the arrestee to accept payment from the pursuers, or to reject payment from his own proper debtor. He is entitled at the termination of his lease to receive from his landlord one-half of the value of the plant upon the ground let upon his removing himself from the premises. Now, the landlord's obligation is not attached by the arrestment, and could not be attached by any diligence, for payment of the landlord's own debt. There is nothing to prevent the tenant from enforcing his obligation at the termination of the lease, and the diligence which has been used in his hands cannot compel him to accept the arresting creditor as his debtor in place of his landlord, and to refuse payment if it were offered to him by the landlord or by the incoming tenant. An arrester cannot in any way affect the right of the arrestee to recover his own debt. The sole operation of the attachment, if it be effectual at all, is to prevent the arrestee paying debts due to somebody else, or parting with goods belonging to somebody else; it cannot prejudice his right to enforce obligations prestable to himself. But even if it be assumed that the tenant is willing to take payment from the arrester and to discharge his own debtor, I think the conclusion which is supposed to follow upon implement of that condition is untenable. The pursuers' assumption is that as soon as the arrestee has been paid off, there will arise to them an immediate right to obtain an order for the sale of the moveable plant. But that is not the right of an arresting

No. 217. creditor, and I think Mr Macfarlane's criticism upon that conclusion was perfectly just, that there is no operative decree against anybody. And that is not merely a technical objection. It rests upon a perfectly sound view of the nature of an arrestment, which is not a diligence directly affecting the goods themselves, in whose hands soever they may be, but a diligence in personam, which can only be carried into effect by the operation of a decree for payment or delivery against the person in whose hands the arrestment is used. It is only as a consequence of the creditor's right as against the arrestee to have the goods made forthcoming that he can have a decree for sale. That is clearly laid down in the passages in Lord Stair's Institutes, to which I called attention on a previous occasion. What Lord Stair says about forthcoming is this. In the first place, he says that "When pursuits are for making arrested goods forthcoming which are not liquid, the party in whose hands arrestment was made will not be decerned for making forthcoming a liquid sum for the price, but if he offer the goods themselves the decree will contain a warrant to roup the goods, that the price thereof may be delivered to the arrester." Then in a subsequent passage he says this, speaking of the executive action arising from arrestment—"It is an action for making arrested goods forthcoming which reacheth no further than the satisfaction of the sum for which the arrestment was laid on, and the title of it were much more suitable to be adjudication upon arrestment, for it is as properly an adjudication of a moveable interest as the adjudications of land rights. Neither is it the making of the goods or sums forthcoming that is the proper effect of this action, but the adjudging of them to the arrester; for if goods be arrested the haver is liberated by producing the goods, whereby they are made forthcoming, but they become not the arrester's until they be roup'd and sold and the price delivered to the arrester." Therefore you must fix upon the arrestee an obligation to deliver the goods before you can have any decree of sale. Now, there is nothing in the conclusions of this summons, either by way of declarator or by way of operative decree, to define the claim for delivery of goods, which the pursuer supposes to have been transferred from the common debtor to himself. And when one comes to consider what the nature of the arrestee's obligation really is, I confess I do not wonder that the pursuers have not been able to formulate a decree which would satisfy these conditions. The tenant under the lease is joint owner of the machinery and plant, half the value of which he paid for at the beginning, but on the determination of the lease he is to obtain one-half of the value from the landlord, and the plant is to become the exclusive property of the latter. Now, the assumption of the action is, that upon that payment being made, some obligation will arise against him to make over or deliver the plant to the landlord; but it appears to me that the only obligation in the lease is that upon the determination of his right the tenant shall leave the premises and depart, leaving the plant for the landlord. Therefore it appears to me that the fact which determines the tenant's joint right and interest in the plant at the same moment determines his possession, and I am unable to see what the obligation is that the arresting creditor thinks that he has attached so as to compel the tenant to perform to him instead of performing to his landlord. It turns out that in point of fact the tenant upon determination of his lease received payment of the money to which he was entitled. Now, I have already said that there is nothing in the attachment effected by the arrestments which can prevent his doing that. That was his absolute right.

Well then, upon receiving that payment he goes away. But that is exactly what he was bound to do under his lease, and I do not understand how it could be supposed that any right should arise to the arresting creditor in consequence of which he could compel the tenant either to retain possession of the subjects let to him under his lease after the period determined, or if he did not do that, to take possession of the plant and machinery in order to make them forthcoming to the arrester. I think there was no obligation of the kind, and therefore I am still unable to see that any obligation by the tenant to the landlord existed which has been effectually attached by arrestment, and which the arresting creditor can now compel the tenant to perform to him. In that view I think we are now in a position to say that the arrestment has been futile, that the interest of the landlord in the machinery and plant in question has not been validly attached, and that the defenders are therefore to be assoilzied.

Patent—Anticipation—Lamp.—The specification for a patent for an improved oil-spray lighting and heating apparatus working with self-generated steam, described as part of the apparatus an air-tight water-tank from which water was led to a pipe coiled round the lower part of the flame of the lamp, where the water was converted into steam. To neutralise the back pressure of the steam in the coil upon the water supply pipe, another pipe was led from the top of the coil to the top of the water-tank, which admitted the steam pressure to the surface of the water.

The patentee claimed as his invention "the method of creating a pressure in the water-tank by admitting steam from the self-generating coil or chamber to the said tank."

In an action by the patentee for interdict against the infringement of the patent, the Court assoiilzied the defenders on the ground that the patent had been anticipated by a self-generating oil-vapour lamp in which the back pressure in the oil supply pipe caused by the oil vapour in a generating chamber similar to that of the pursuer was neutralised by admitting oil vapour from the chamber to the oil-tank substantially in the same way as the steam was admitted to the water-tank of the pursuer's apparatus.

In November 1891 Rose's Patents Company, Limited, as in right of letters-patent (No. 18,101, of 1889) for "Improvements in apparatus for burning hydrocarbon, or other oils for lighting and heating purposes," granted to George Rose and assigned to the company, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Frederick Braby & Company, Limited, praying to have the defenders interdicted from infringing the said letters-patent, and, in particular, to have them interdicted from "making, offering for sale, selling, or using without the consent, licence, or agreement of the pursuers, any oil-spray lamps, or oil-spray lighting apparatus, working with self-generated steam in which a pressure is created in the water-tank by admitting steam from the self-generating coil or chamber to said tank by means of a pipe connection for conduct-

In defence Braby & Company pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuers' letters-patent, being invalid for the reasons set forth in the defences, interdict should be refused; and in support of this plea averred, inter alia, “(1) The alleged invention was not at the date of the alleged letters-patent the subject-matter of a grant within the meaning of the Patent Acts. There is no ingenuity or invention displayed in said invention.

. . . (2) There is no sufficient distinction between what was old, or was in use and known at and prior to the date of the letters-patent, and what was new. These are claimed as new inventions which were old. In particular, Claims 1 and 2 include the inventions of a method and appliances for creating pressure which was anticipated by Doty's Patent, No. 8697, A.D. 1887, and by Robinson's Patent, No. 3696, A.D. 1889.

. . . (3) The alleged invention was not new, and was publicly known before the date of the letters-patent. In particular, the invention was published in the following letters-patent,—Doty's Patent, No. 8697, A.D. 1887; Robinson's Patent, No. 3696, A.D. 1889.”

In the spray lamps described in Rose's patent the source of light was a jet of steam charged with oil spray which it sucked up from a small oil well at the point of discharge.

The arrangement by which this result was obtained was as follows:—

1. Oil supply.—The oil trickled into the well from an open tank by gravitation.

2. Steam supply.—Alongside the oil-tank was an air-tight water-tank strong enough to resist steam pressure. From this tank, when the lamp was burning, water flowed by gravitation through a pipe coiled round the lower part of the flame where it was converted into steam. The steam was led from the upper part of the coil down to a nozzle below the coil where it was discharged close to the oil well.

To prevent the flow of water into the coil being checked by the back pressure of the steam in the coil, a pipe was led from the top of the coil to the top of the water-tank, so as to admit the steam pressure to the surface of the water. This neutralised the back pressure in the feed-pipe, and allowed the water to flow by force of gravitation.

Before setting the lamp into operation it was necessary to heat the coil to a red heat from an extraneous source, so as to enable it to convert the water into steam.

After the steam was produced the oil was admitted to the well, from which it was caught up in the form of spray by the jet of steam. The flame thus produced kept up the heat of the coil and the lamp worked automatically. The flame extended a long way above the coil.

The following were the heads of the pursuers' claim in their specification, in so far as material to this report:—“1. In oil-spray lighting or heating apparatus working with self-generated steam, the method of creating a pressure in the water-tank by admitting steam from the self-generating coil or chamber to said tank, substantially as hereinbefore described. 2. The combination with the steam-generating coil or chamber of the lamp or burner, of a pipe connection for conducting steam from said coil or chamber to the water-tank, substantially as and for the purpose hereinbefore set forth. 6. In oil-spray lighting or heating apparatus working with self-generated steam, the combination with the water-tank and a self-generating steam coil or chamber of a pipe having a syphon bend therein for supplying water from said tank to the coil or chamber, substantially as hereinbefore set forth. 9. The general arrangement and combination of parts of the self-generating steam lamps, substantially as hereinbefore described with reference to the drawings annexed." * No. 218.

 Rose's Patents
 Co., Limited,
 v. Braby & Co.,
 Limited.

Doty's letters-patent, 1887, for "An improved method of and apparatus for generating light and heat from mineral or other oil," set forth that one object of his invention was "to provide for converting the oil into gas or vapour and for utilising the heat generated by the combustion of the said gas or vapour for heating the pipe in which such conversion is effected, so that the operation will be continuous without the aid of any separate or extraneous heating apparatus." For this purpose his apparatus consisted of a tank containing oil from which a pipe led to a vertical coiled pipe. The upper end of the coiled pipe was connected with another pipe which was brought down to the foot of the coil and then turned round, so that its opening or burner was within the hollow formed by the lower part of the chamber formed by the coil and pointed upwards. Some oil was then placed in a saucer underneath the coil and ignited. The coil thus becoming heated the oil inside the coil pipe was converted into vapour, which, passing down the side pipe to the burner within the coil, was there ignited. In this way the vapourising of the oil and its combustion were continued so long as the oil continued to flow from the tank. To ensure the necessary flow of oil notwithstanding the back pressure caused by the vapourising of the oil in the coil, Doty specified three methods, viz., (1) placing the oil-tank at such a height above the pipe coil that the oil would continue to flow by the mere force of gravity; (2) the use of an air-pump; and (3) by a method thus described,—“In some instances I place the tank or reservoir for the oil only a few inches above the coil, and connect the upper part of this tank or reservoir above the level of the oil with the upper part of the said coil by means of an elbow or bend, and pipes, or in any suitable manner, so that, when a pressure occurs in the coil from the expanding gases it will be communicated to the said tank or reservoir and extended over the surface of the oil, thus rendering the supply more even and the flame more regular.” Doty supplied no figure specially adapted to shew the working of this last method, and the pursuers maintained that the description was unintelligible; the defenders, on the other hand, maintained that any trained workman of ordinary skill could easily, from the description, make the necessary piping arrangement for carrying a portion of the oil vapour into the tank above the oil so as to counteract the back pressure.

Another part of Doty's invention was to provide for the utilisation of a mixture of oil-gas or vapour with steam or water-gas “for heating purposes,” and he specified a modification of his invention intended for the production of heat “for use in blast-furnaces or for other purposes.” In this modification there were two tanks, the one containing water and the other oil, and a coil consisting of two pipes wound alternately, and placed preferably in a horizontal position, one pipe leading from the water-tank

* In certain of the modifications of the pursuers' apparatus, the pipe leading from the water-tank to the coil, instead of being straight, was for a part of its course bent upwards and then down to the former line. This was in the specification termed a “siphon bend,” and it was described as being for “the purpose of keeping a supply of water in the generating coil.” The defenders maintained (at the hearing in the Inner-House) that there was neither novelty nor merit in this “siphon bend,” and consequently that the sixth head of the pursuers' claim was bad and vitiated the whole letters-patent.—Murchland v. Nicholson, July 19, 1893, 20 R. 1006.

No. 218. and the other from the oil-tank. From the end of each of these pipes another pipe was carried back along the outside of the coil, and then turned so that the outlet of each pipe with a burner attached was within the hollow formed by the coil, as in the case of Doty's form of apparatus first described. The coil having been heated by igniting oil in a tray, the oil and the water were respectively converted into steam and oil vapour, which being discharged in contiguous jets, and ignited within the coil hollow, a fierce combustion resulted. Neither the specification, nor the figure annexed as relative to this modification, shewed how the back pressures resulting from the generation of the steam and the oil vapour were to be neutralised; and the pursuers consequently maintained that this apparatus was unworkable, while the defenders contended that this part of the specification was to be read with reference to the earlier portion, and therefore that any of the methods there specified for neutralising the back pressure were intended to be employed, so that the apparatus was one by which the back pressure might be neutralised by leading a portion of the oil vapour and the steam to the tops of the oil-tank and of the water-tank respectively.

Rose's Patents
Co., Limited,
v. Braby & Co.,
Limited.

Robinson's patent, 1889, described an apparatus for producing a jet of heated oil vapour from mineral oil similar to that used by Rose for producing steam from water—the back pressure in the feed-pipe supplying oil to the coil being overcome in the same way. Instead, however, of the vapour generator being in the form of a coil like the steam generator in Rose's patent, it was constructed of a series of straight tubes connected with each other arranged in a square round the flame. These tubes were fitted with screw stoppers, which might be removed for the purpose of clearing out the deposit arising from the vapourising of the oil.

A proof was allowed. The evidence shewed that lamps of the general class now in question were of two kinds, oil-vapour lamps and oil-spray lamps. In oil-vapour lamps the oil was vapourised and then burned, as in Robinson's apparatus. The objection to this species of lamp was that owing to the deposit of carbon formed by the vapourising of the oil, the pipes of the generator were apt to become choked, thereby necessitating frequent cleaning and the use of an expensive oil. In oil-spray lamps the oil was not vapourised, but was sprayed into the generator in a cold form by means of steam, as in the pursuers' apparatus. Prior to the date of that apparatus the necessary steam had been supplied in such lamps from an independent boiler, which made the lamps not readily portable, and there was evidence that lamp manufacturers were anxious to produce a spray lamp which, the steam being self-generated and the lamp working automatically, should be easily portable.

On 29th June 1892 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) granted interdict as craved.

On appeal the Sheriff (Berry) on 6th March 1893 adhered.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—At the time when Rose took out his patent both oil-vapour lamps and oil-spray lamps were known. It was also a well-known scientific principle that the back pressure caused by the generation of steam or vapour could be neutralised by using a portion of the steam or vapour, and one apparatus for doing this in the case of lamps was to be found in Doty's and in Robinson's patents. If therefore Rose's patent was for the principle of neutralising the back pressure of steam, it was obviously bad; there could not be a patent for a well-known scientific principle; if it was a patent for a particular apparatus for applying this principle it was bad, on the ground that the apparatus was identical with those of Doty and of Robinson, and there could not be a patent for applying a known article to purposes which were analogous to those to which it had already been applied. Rose simply took Robinson and Doty's apparatus for neutralising back pressure, and applied it to water instead of to oil. The mere substitution of water for oil did not entitle him to a patent, although his apparatus might have advantages not produced before.¹ Further, Doty's specification in figure 5 shewed an apparatus in which the back pressure of steam was neutralised for a purpose identical with Rose's, it being a matter of no importance that Doty said his figure 5 shewed an apparatus for the production of heat, and not of light; it produced both. It was said that Doty's specification was not full enough to enable a lamp like Rose's to be made merely from Doty's directions. That might be; Doty's patent might be bad. But the question was whether it contained enough to enable, not a mechanic, but a man of science in the particular department to construct a lamp like Rose's. If it did then Rose's patent was bad.² Once the idea was suggested—it might be in an unworkable form—there was no room for inventive ingenuity, and therefore for a patent. Tried by that test Rose had been anticipated by Doty. The pursuers sought to bring themselves within the Braided Wire case,³ arguing that that case decided that although bustles were well known and braided wire was well known, there could nevertheless be a good patent for a combination of the two. The ratio of the judgment there was, however, that the method of fastening was novel and patentable. If necessary, the defenders would maintain that *Stewart and Briggs*⁴ was badly decided. But the question there was whether the pursuers' patent had been infringed, not whether it had been anticipated. The Court held that it had not been infringed, because by the terms of his specification he had tied himself down to his slot being in the upper side of his die. It did not follow that if the question there had been whether the defenders' patent had been anticipated by the pursuers, the defenders' patent would have been held good.

Argued for the pursuers;—Of the utility of Rose's apparatus there could be no doubt. It was cheaper than any other form of oil-spray lamp in existence prior to the date of Rose's patent, for neither pump nor independent steam generator was necessary, and, going automatically, it did not require attendance. It was easily portable, and, there being no pump, it was less likely to go out of order. Again, the oil-can, having no lid, could be refilled at pleasure without putting out the light, and without causing any danger. As contrasted with oil-vapour lamps which worked automatically, such as Robinson's, the advantage of Rose's lamp was that in it there was no risk of choking owing to the accumulation of deposit in the coil or generator. Automatic oil-vapour lamps thus required an expensive class of oil, while with Rose's lamp a cheap oil could be used. Nor could there be any reasonable doubt of the ingenuity of Rose's apparatus. The mere simplicity of an invention was not a ground for denying its ingenuity; it might be something which everybody would be surprised had not been thought of before.⁵ The question was as to the novelty of Rose's lamp. It was said that it had been anticipated—in particular by Doty and by Robinson. Now, the test on that matter was whether the antecedent statement, which was founded on as an anticipation, was such that a person of ordinary knowledge of the subject could merely by reading the antecedent statement and without further experiment, make the apparatus in question. If something remained to be discovered which was necessary to the useful application of the antecedent statement, then there was room for a new valid patent.¹ Tried by that test, Doty's patent was not an anticipation of Rose's. Apart from his figure 5, Doty's specification, in so far as it bore on the present question, was nothing more than Robinson's in embryo, and therefore, if the defenders failed upon Robinson's specification, the case against them upon Doty's specification was a fortiori; if they succeeded upon Robinson they did not require Doty. Doty's figure 5 was no doubt in a somewhat different position. If the earlier part of his specification could be read as containing an intelligible method of automatically neutralising the back pressure of a vapour or gas analogous to that employed by Rose, and if that description could legitimately be read into the description applicable to figure 5, then an apparatus would be described which resembled Rose's in this, that the back pressure of steam would be neutralised in the same way in both. But it was to be noticed that Doty's object in figure 5 was not the production of light but of heat, and that he obtained that result not by producing an oil spray through the application of steam to cold oil but by combining steam with oil vapour; and as, on the defenders' construction of Doty's specification, the back pressure of the oil vapour was neutralised in the same way as that of the steam, the apparatus would be open to all the objections arising from the choking of the generator, &c., to which automatic oil-vapour lamps were open. Apart, however, from this, Doty's specification, as regarded figure 5, was so vague and unintelligible that a person of ordinary skill could not, merely by reading that specification, make a lamp like Rose's. Robinson's specification was not open to the objection of unintelligibility; consequently, if Rose's lamp was the same as Robinson's, the pursuers' case failed. What the defenders said was that Rose had simply taken Robinson's apparatus and used water where he used oil. In one sense this was obviously not true, since steam would not burn. But taking it that the defenders meant that Rose had taken Robinson's apparatus and applied it to a use so closely analogous as to require the exercise of no inventive ingenuity to make the application, then the defenders failed. It was not safe to assume that what could be done with oil could be done with water. It required experiment to discover that. Then Rose's apparatus and Robinson's were essentially different. Rose's was an oil-spray lamp, Robinson's an oil-vapour lamp. No doubt oil-spray lamps were known before Rose's, and the automatic regulation of steam was also known before, but Rose was the first to make the combination. The authorities were with the pursuers. Patents for the combination of old methods had been sustained, although there was much less ingenuity required to make the combination than Rose had shewn here.² Stewart and Briggs v. Moore,³ and the *Braided Wire*⁴ case, were probably the strongest examples. The judgment of the Sheriffs ought therefore to be affirmed.

Rose's Patents
Co., Limited,
v. Braby & Co.,
Limited.

The pursuers' apparatus as described in the specification consists of two tanks, one containing water and the other containing oil. From the water-tank a pipe is led which is coiled into a vertical coil set above the orifice from the oil-tank. The pipe of the coil is at the top divided into two branches, one of which is brought down to the burner nipple of the branch, and the other is carried into the water-tank above, so that when steam is generated a pressure is produced on the water in the tank to counterbalance the back pressure produced by the steam in the coil pressing back and preventing the flow of the water into the coil by gravitation. When the apparatus is set going by heat artificially applied to the coil, the steam which is conveyed to the lamp nozzle, forcing itself out in a jet, carries with it oil spray from the oil orifice, and a large luminous flame is thus produced.

The defenders' lamp is, as regards the obtaining of the back pressure, substantially the same as the pursuers', but the defenders plead that the pursuers', in so far as there may be any invention in their lamp, was anticipated, and that their alleged invention does not shew any novelty which can be held to have any merit or ingenuity such as would entitle the pursuers to the privileges of a patent. It is maintained that the specifications of Doty and of Robinson both disclose the equivalent of what is claimed by the pursuers. Doty in his specification describes an arrangement by which the pressure of the vapour of oil on the top of the oil-tank is produced in a similar manner to that used by the pursuers in the case of the water-tank, for the purpose of neutralising the back pressure. He also describes as a modification of his invention an arrangement whereby he uses two coils, wound side by side, one for oil and another for water, in the same manner as the single coil for oil. It is true that the purpose he has in view in this arrangement is the production of heat rather than light, but this does not, as it appears to me, make any difference, the end to be attained in both cases being the production of continuous flame by steam carrying oil vapour, and its utilisation whether for heating or lighting purposes in no way affecting the process by which the flame is obtained and kept up. It is true also that in his figure of the double coil he does not shew the arrangement for pressure on the upper surface of the liquid in the tank. But that has been already described, and he indicates that the oil and steam are discharged from their respective vessels in the same manner. If this be so, then Doty had in his specification already described the use of a coil with water, in which by a pressure on the surface produced by part of the steam generated, the back pressure on the feed-pipe of the coil might be neutralised. Having given the matter as careful attention as I can, I hold that Doty does disclose in his specification the use for flame producing purposes of a water-tank, provided with a coil, and the use of a branch steam-pipe for the purpose of producing a neutralising pressure on the water in a water-tank, so as to secure the flow of water into the coil.

If I were wrong in this opinion, it would still remain to be considered

No. 218. whether, if the pursuers' process were not anticipated by any apparatus in which water and steam were used in the apparatus itself, it was not anticipated otherwise. It is certain that both Doty's and Robinson's specifications disclose a closed chamber for oil, a feed into a coil, and a branch pipe for producing a pressure on the surface of the oil. Doty, while describing his tank as placed high above the burner, or a pump arrangement employed to give pressure, distinctly describes as another mode the maintenance of pressure by connecting the upper part of the tank with the pipe carrying the vapour from the heated coil, and gives this as one modification of his invention. Robinson claims as part of his invention the maintaining of an automatic pressure in the oil reservoir by vapour from the coil, as a means of dispensing with the use of a pump, or other auxiliary means for obtaining a pressure on the surface of the liquid. It is thus certain that apparatus whereby, in an exactly similar manner to that used by the pursuers, vapour was generated and used to put pressure on the surface of liquid in an enclosed tank to counteract back pressure was in existence, and publicly known, before the pursuers obtained their patent. It is therefore essential to the validity of the pursuers' patent that there should be in it some merit or ingenuity in particulars different from those above described. Are there any such in this case? I can find none suggested, except this,—that the pursuers apply the arrangement to water and not to oil. That does not, as it appears to me, constitute any patentable invention. That pressure could be applied to water by steam in a closed vessel, just as it could be applied by oil vapour to oil, was a fact well known, and the purpose for which it was applied in both cases was the same,—to neutralise a back pressure which would stop the feed into the apparatus. Therefore even if the pursuers' apparatus using water was not anticipated by Doty, I hold that the pursuers' specification does not display any such ingenuity in producing an invention not already known as to give validity to the patent.

I have only to add that had my opinion been different upon the patent generally, I should still have been unable to sustain it, as there is a claim made in it which could not possibly, as it appears to me, be held good. In the 6th head of the claim, the pursuers set forth as one of the claims "the combination with the water-tank and a self-generating coil or chamber of a pipe having a syphon bend therein for supplying water from said tank to the coil or chamber," substantially as therein described. Now, on referring to the description I find that the water-supply pipe has a "syphon bend which is for the purpose of keeping a supply of water in the generating coil." I am unable to understand what there is in this that can be claimed. It is certainly not a syphon, and it is also certain that the same purpose could be fulfilled equally well by a horizontal bend, or by a bulb, or by having the piece of pipe between the tank and the coil of a larger size. I can see nothing of the nature of invention or ingenuity in this head of claim, which could make it the subject of a patent. But if this claim is not tenable, then it renders the whole patent bad, even if it were otherwise good.

On the whole matter, I have come to the conclusion that the interlocutors pronounced in the Court below are not well founded, and that the defenders are entitled to have them recalled, and to be assoilized from the conclusions of the action.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The pursuers are the assignees of a patent taken out by George Rose and others. It is for a combination which may in general terms be called an automatic spray lamp. Before it was taken out lamps which consumed the spray or vapour of oil were well known and in frequent use. But they were not automatic. They required a separate means—such as a pump, or steam raised in a separate boiler—to maintain the necessary current. The pursuers claim that their invention has satisfied a felt want, and produced a spray lamp which, dispensing with the use of pumps and other equivalents, furnishes a continuous supply of oil spray at the burner.

Rose's Patents
Co., Limited,
v. Braby & Co.,
Limited.

The defenders contend that the patent has been anticipated. They rely chiefly on the patents of Doty and Robinson. They also contend that, in so far as the pursuers' patent differs from these patents, it has no merit or ingenuity. There are some other subsidiary objections to which I shall hereafter refer.

The apparatus of Rose consists of a vessel containing a tank of oil and a tank of water. From the former a pipe is conducted to the burner. A pipe is led from the bottom of the water-tank which is carried in several coils round the burner, and thence passes to the tank above the level of the water. From this pipe, and at a point near the top of the coil, another is taken off which joins the oil pipe near the burner.

The water flows by gravitation and stands in the coil. Some waste steeped in grease or oil is placed in the coil and set on fire. Steam is thus generated, which passes partly to the top of the water-tank and partly to the burner. The former portion serves to produce a pressure on the water so as to balance the back pressure in the lower part of the pipe, and thus enables the water to be supplied by gravitation to the coil. The other pressure produces a current of steam through the pipe near the burner, and when the oil is allowed to flow from the tank the steam carries the oil with it in the form of spray. The spray is lighted, and from its heat continues the process which the burning waste began. In this way the lamp needs no extraneous aid, and contains in itself the means of producing a continuous light.

The merit of the invention seems to consist in the apparatus by which this continuity is maintained. Accordingly the patentee claims,—“In oil-spray lighting or heating apparatus working with self-generated steam the method of creating a pressure in the water-tank by admitting steam from the self-generating coil or chamber to said tank substantially as hereinbefore described.” The problem was to construct, as a part of a lamp, an apparatus capable of producing a continuous current at the burner. The difficulty was in overcoming the back pressure in the pipe leading from the tank, and it was successfully overcome in the manner I have described.

I see considerable merit in the apparatus. But unfortunately for the pursuers Rose was not the first and true inventor of it. An apparatus of the same kind was indicated in Doty's specification, and probably it was sufficiently indicated to a person possessing ordinary skill. But it is not necessary to dwell on this, for Robinson's patent precedes that of Rose, and it describes an apparatus identical with that set out in Rose's specification. There are some slight differences in detail, but to my mind it is not doubtful that the two are the same. In particular they both contain that bifurcation of pipe which overcomes the back pressure and enables a continuous current to be maintained at the burner.

The pursuers hardly deny that their apparatus is the same as Robinson's. Their case is that it is applied to a different use. For the lamp constructed by Robinson is an oil-vapour lamp, and consequently his apparatus is intended to vapourise the oil and to produce a continuous supply of oil vapour. The pressure

No. 218. which it creates is in the oil-tank and not in the water-tank, and it is created by the admission of oil vapour and not of steam. The pursuers contend that there is no identity, inasmuch as the apparatus of Rose is used for generating a continuous current of steam in order to produce a continuous oil spray.

The merit of Rose, in these circumstances, comes to be the application of an old apparatus to a new use. But there cannot be a good patent unless there is ingenuity or merit in the application. Accordingly the pursuers bring evidence to shew that their apparatus has been alone successful, and makes it possible to use any kind of oil; whereas the apparatus of Robinson is liable to choke from the deposit of oil distillates, and from that cause the finest oils can alone be used.

I have come to be of opinion that the pursuers' patent cannot be supported, because there is, I think, no merit or ingenuity in the new use of the apparatus. When the system of producing a continuous current is known, there is no merit in producing it from steam and not from oil, nor is there any merit in applying a current of steam to produce oil spray. It was done in the spray lamps which had heretofore been in use. That the spray lamp has in the automatic form advantages over the vapour lamp is not material, for the claim of the patentee is not for those advantages but for the new use.

The 6th claiming clause of the pursuers' specification is in these terms:—"In oil-spray lighting or heating apparatus working with self-generated steam, the combination with the water-tank and a self-generating steam coil or chamber of a pipe having a syphon bend therein for supplying water from said tank to the coil or chamber, substantially as hereinbefore set forth." It is maintained that what is thus claimed has neither novelty nor utility.

The syphon bend is "for the purpose of keeping a supply of water in the generating coil." It does not act as a syphon, nor is it maintained that it does, although the bend "is for the purpose of keeping a supply of water in the generating coil." If the water is allowed to flow from the tank there is no use of the bend. But if it be shut off it is true that the water in the bend of the syphon nearest the coil will flow to the coil, and thus a larger quantity of water will reach it. But that is nothing more than saying that a bent pipe, being longer than a straight pipe, will contain more water, and if the bend be upright gravitation will act. It was contended that by this contrivance the steam had to pass for a shorter distance from the coil to the water-tank. But there is no novelty or merit in that. It is not a new thing to increase the length of a pipe between two fixed points by bending it, nor is it new that the water will flow down if the curve be upright. I see nothing more than this in the 6th claim of the patent. I think that it is a bad claim, and if it be it avoids the entire patent.

LORD TRAYNER.—I have nothing to add. I entirely concur in the opinions which your Lordships have expressed.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff dated 29th June 1892 and 6th March and 18th October 1893: Find that the petitioners are assignees of letters-patent granted to George Rose and others: Find that in the specifications lodged in connection with said letters-patent the patentees claim to have invented an apparatus for producing a continuous current of oil spray at the burner of a spray lamp by a continuous current of steam generated in the lamp itself : Find that in the specification lodged in connection with prior letters-patent granted to Doty and Robinson, Nos. 8697, A.D. 1887, and 3696, A.D. 1889, the same apparatus was specified, and that it was specified to be used in the same way as the apparatus claimed by George Rose and others, except that it was intended to be used with oil alone, and in order to produce a continuous current of oil vapour at the burner of the lamp : Find that in the specification lodged in reference to the prior letters-patent granted to Doty an apparatus is specified substantially the same as the apparatus claimed by George Rose and others, and specified for the same uses : Find that there was neither ingenuity nor merit in applying the said apparatus to the production of a continuous current of oil spray in the manner described in the said specification of Rose and others : Find that the said George Rose and others are not the first and true inventors of the said apparatus : Find that there is no novelty or merit in the syphon bend claimed in the sixth claim of the specification of George Rose and others for the purposes therein set forth : Find in law that the said patent is invalid ; therefore assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the petition," &c.

Burgh—Dean of Guild—Process—Petition for lining—Necessity for objections being in writing.—In a petition in a Dean of Guild Court for a lining the burgh surveyor, who was called as a respondent, appeared in Court before the Dean of Guild and stated verbal objections to the granting of the petition, but without having lodged written answers. The Dean of Guild having refused the petition, and the petitioner having appealed, the Court intimated that the surveyor could not be heard unless he lodged written answers, and having, of consent of the petitioner, allowed the surveyor to put in objections, remitted the cause to the Dean of Guild to make up a record on the petition and answers.

Police—Road—Street—"New Street"—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), secs. 152 and 153.—The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 152, enacts that from and after the date when the Act comes into operation, "it shall not be lawful to form or lay out any new street or part thereof," except under certain specified conditions ; and by section 153 it is provided "that the provisions of this Act relating to the width and construction of streets shall not extend or apply to any existing streets . . . which shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioners to have been agreed to or to have been formed previous to the application of the Act."

A street in a burgh which had been formed many years prior to the Act had buildings on the south side only, the street being bounded on the north by the back-gardens of another street, and by a piece of ground belonging to A at the west end of the street.

In a petition by A for authority to erect a house on the boundary of his property adjoining the street, the burgh surveyor opposed the petition on the ground that the intended building would fix the line of building on the north side of the street, and would amount to forming a new street, or part thereof, in the sense of the Act, and that the proposed building did not comply with the conditions of the Act applicable to new streets. The Dean of Guild refused the petition.

In an appeal, the Court held that the proposed building could not be regarded as part of a new street, and that the petition should be granted.

Stewart v.

2D DIVISION.
Dean of Guild
Court, Kirkintilloch.

IN August 1893 Mrs Jane Stewart presented a petition in the Dean of Guild Court, Kirkintilloch, for a lining and warrant to erect shops and dwelling-houses on property belonging to her at the corner of Cowgate Street and Victoria Street, Kirkintilloch.

The burgh surveyor, who was called as a respondent, appeared before the Dean of Guild and stated objections verbally to the granting of the petition, but lodged no written answers. After hearing parties and inspecting the ground, the Dean of Guild, on 28th October, refused the prayer of the petition.

The petitioner appealed.

On 20th January 1894, when the case was called on the appeal, the Court intimated that the surveyor could not be heard unless he lodged written answers to the petition.

Thereafter, the surveyor having been, of consent of the petitioner, allowed to put in answers, including a separate statement of facts, to which the petitioner lodged answers, the Court on 27th January pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the appeal for the pursuer against the interlocutor of the Dean of Guild, recall the said interlocutor, and remit the cause back to the Dean of Guild to receive the answers for the respondent, and answers for the appellant, and to make up a record and proceed in the cause." A record was made up in the Dean of Guild Court accordingly.

The respondent, the surveyor, in his statement of facts averred,— "Victoria Street has not yet been 'formed or laid out,' within the meaning of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, and sections 146 to 153 thereof. It will, by the erection of the proposed buildings, be formed or laid out 'as a new street, or part thereof,' within the meaning of the said sections." . . . "It has not been proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioners that Victoria Street was agreed to, or was formed previous to the application of the said Act." *

The petitioner in her answers to the respondent's statement of facts, did not dispute that, if Victoria Street would by the erection of her buildings be laid out "as a new street or part thereof," her buildings, if erected as proposed by her, would not be in compliance with the sections of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, relating to the breadth of streets, &c., founded on by the respondent; but she averred,— "Victoria Street, formed and used as a street, has been in existence since 1836. . . . The Commissioners by their actings in the past have recognised Victoria Street as a street which was formed long prior to the date of the said Act."

A proof disclosed the following facts:—Victoria Street was a cul-de-sac running westward at right angles to Cowgate Street, Cowgate Street being one of the chief streets in Kirkintilloch. The petitioner's ground was situated at the north-east corner formed by the junction of the two street. Immediately opposite her property, i.e., on the south-east corner, was a property with buildings on it belonging to Robert Hendrie, and beyond Hendrie's property, on the same side, were several other feus, also built on, belonging to different proprietors, the south side of Victoria Street being entirely built upon, but Hendrie's ground and building projected

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 153, contains, inter alia, this proviso,— "Provided always, that the provisions of this Act relating to the width and construction of streets or courts shall not extend or apply to any existing streets or courts which shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioners to have been agreed to, or to have been formed, previous to the application of this Act."

10 feet further to the north than the other properties and buildings on the south side. On the north side of Victoria Street, and to the west of the petitioner's ground, were the back-gardens of a street called Kerr Street, which was parallel with Victoria Street. The south walls of these back-gardens were in a line with the south boundary of the petitioner's property. The distance between the back-gardens and the houses opposite was 20 feet, but the distance between the petitioner's south boundary and Hendrie's property was, owing to the projection of that property, only 10 feet. The petitioner proposed to build to the extreme boundary of her property, leaving consequently a street of 10 feet in breadth between her house and Hendrie's, which was very much less than the breadth permitted by the Burgh Police Act in the case of "new streets."

Marshall.

The buildings on the south side of Victoria Street were erected long prior to the Act of 1892, most of them having been erected about 1837. The petitioner's ground was at that date, and remained for many years afterwards, unenclosed, nothing being erected on it except occasionally pedlars' booths and the like, and the public being in the habit of walking over it. In 1883 the petitioner's author let it upon a lease terminable at six months' notice, and the tenant, after obtaining a decree of lining, put up a workshop on the ground with a railing round it. The ground remained in this condition until the petitioner acquired it in 1892. The distance between the railing and Hendrie's house was about 10 feet, and while the ground was thus occupied this 10 feet was the only public access to the rest of Victoria Street.

Victoria Street was on the register of streets of the burgh. The houses on the south side had been, since 1878, numbered with odd numbers. Gas, water, and sewage pipes were laid in the street; these, so far as between Hendrie's and petitioner's property, being laid entirely in the passage 10 feet broad, already mentioned. The petitioner's ground was about 2 feet above the level of that passage. In 1881 a pavement of Caithness flagstone was, by order of the Police Commissioners, laid along Cowgate Street, and at the point where Victoria Street joins Cowgate Street only a 10 feet crossing was left in this pavement. This crossing was causewayed, but Victoria Street was not. It was made up of broken bricks, masons' and joiners' shivers, with ashes laid on the top. In 1887 public gas lamps were introduced into Victoria Street.

On 20th April 1894 the Dean of Guild refused the petition.

The petitioner appealed, and argued;—Victoria Street was not a "new street" in the sense of the Burgh Police Act, 1892. The evidence shewed that it had for many years been, and been recognised by the Police Commissioners as, a street. That was enough under the Act to take it out of the category of "new streets." The English decisions referred to by the respondent had no application to cases like the present. They related to country roads, which, on being included within burghs, became "streets" in the sense that they were put on the Burgh Register of Streets, but they did not become streets in a proper sense until houses were erected, or were proposed to be erected along them.

Argued for the respondent;—The clauses of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, regulating the width of streets and the height of houses, applied to the present case. A street, in the ordinary popular sense of the term, was a road with houses or buildings on both sides of it.¹ Victoria Street had not hitherto possessed that character, although it was doubtless a street within the meaning of the interpretation clause of the

No. 219. Act, which was wide enough to include any roadway, whether built on or not. If, however, the present application were to be granted, a permanent line of street would be formed for the first time on the north side of Victoria Street. That would amount to forming or laying out a new street, or part thereof, in the sense of the Act. This view was strongly confirmed by several decisions in England on similar clauses in English statutes.¹ The Police Commissioners had never recognised Victoria Street as a street; de facto, the inhabitants of this cul-de-sac had used it as the access to their houses—that was all.

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The lining for which the pursuer applies is opposed by the Police Commissioners of the burgh, on the ground that the proposed building is in contravention of the 152d section of the Police Act of 1892.

That turns on the question whether the pursuer is proposing to lay out a new street, or part of a new street.

We have here nothing to do with public roads which have been included in burgh under special statutory powers, and what, on being included, came to be streets of the burgh. Victoria Street was never a public road. It led to no public place. It was never anything else than a street. It has been regarded for many years as a street, and it has been partly built on, though on one side only. It has been all along dealt with by the Police Commissioners as a street. I do not think that the pursuer proposes to form any new street, or any part of a new street. She is merely proposing to build up to the building line of an existing street in the burgh.

LORD YOUNG, LORD TRAYNER, and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of 24th April 1894, found that the petitioner in erecting the proposed buildings “is not proposing to form or lay out any new street or part thereof”; therefore repelled the pleas stated by the respondent, and remitted to the Dean of Guild to grant the lining as craved.

Notary-public—Deprivation of office.

2. Held that the Court of Session has jurisdiction to deprive a notary-public of office. Incorporated Society of Law-Agents in Scotland v. Laing, Dec. 12, 1893, p. 267.

ADVERTISEMENT. See Contract, 1.

AGENT AND CLIENT. Funds in agent's hands for special purpose—Bankruptcy of client.

1. A, a person charged with crime, having sent a sum of money to a law-agent to be used for the purposes of his defence, and having been sequestrated before the trial, and while the agent still had part of the money in his hands, held, in an action of accounting at the instance of the trustee in the sequestration against the agent, that the mandate to the agent was a revocable contract, which fell by the sequestration, and consequently that the defender was bound to account to the trustee for all sums in his hands belonging to A at the date of the sequestration. M'Kenzie v. Campbell, June 13, 1894, p. 904.

Agent and Principal—Liability for disclosed principal—Foreign—Custom—English custom applicable to solicitors.

2. In an action by an English solicitor against a law-agent in Scotland for payment of an account for professional services, the pursuer averred that he had been employed by the defenders to conduct a litigation in England for a client, and that by the custom of England a solicitor employing another for a client was personally liable to the solicitor employed for costs. After a proof, held that the pursuer had failed to prove that the custom extended to the case of an English solicitor employed by a Scots law-agent. Livesey v. Purdom & Sons, June 15, 1894, p. 911.

Negligence—Employment—Relevancy.

In an action of damages against a law-agent the pursuers averred that in 1852, when they were in minority, their father held a sum of money belonging to them; that without consulting them he borrowed this sum; that the pursuers' mother voluntarily offered to give security over certain heritable subjects belonging to her in which she was not infeft, that their father, as their curator, and their mother, instructed the defender to draw up a bond and disposition in security; that the defender prepared a bond and disposition in security, but did not complete the mother's title by infeftment; that the pursuers did not know of the granting of the bond till 1889; that it was the defender's duty to complete the mother's title, and that his failure to do so had resulted in the loss of the sum borrowed. Held that as the pursuers did not aver that the defender had been instructed to complete the mother's title, the action was not relevant. Auchincloss v. Duncan, July 20, 1894, p. 1091.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL Right in Security—Ship—Bill of lading.

A bank advanced money to P. on the security of merchandise then afloat, P. delivering the bill of lading to the bank. Subsequently the bank sent the bill of lading to P. as trustee for the bank to obtain delivery of the merchandise on arrival and sell it for behoof of the bank. Held that the bank by sending the bill of lading to P. had lost their real security over the merchandise, which thus became the unburdened property of P., and liable to the diligence of his creditors. North-Western Bank, Limited, v. Poynter, Sons, & Macdonald, Feb. 2, 1894, p. 513.

Agent—Title to sue.

On 31st March Stewart, Brown, & Company sent the following sale-note to Biggart & Fulton:—"We have this day sold to you, on account of Stevenson & Company, Manila, 100 tons of sugar at £10, 17s. 3d. c. i. f. Liverpool . . . we to accept shippers' drafts at 3 m/s." Biggart & Fulton authorised Stewart, Brown, & Company to take delivery of and sell the sugar on arrival in Liverpool and to credit themselves with the proceeds against the price, and their outlay in taking delivery of the sugar and selling it. The proceeds of the sale in Liverpool were insufficient to meet the price, &c., and Stewart, Brown, & Company (together with Stevenson & Company) sued Biggart & Fulton for the difference. In defence Biggart & Fulton pleaded no title to sue, in respect that Stewart, Brown, & Company, as agents for a disclosed principal, had no title, and that Stevenson & Company had no title, as they had made no contract with Biggart & Fulton. On a proof it appeared that Stevenson & Company were in the custom of sending cargoes of sugar to this country for sale, but instead of breaking the cargoes into quantities to suit purchasers they disposed of them entire to brokers upon contracts which bore that the broker was "buyer" of the cargo at a certain sum per ton. The broker then disposed of the sugar in lots to the buyers whom he had secured at a somewhat increased rate per ton, he receiving the difference. Stewart, Brown, & Company held the cargo, of which the 100 tons in question was a part, on a contract in these terms, and disposed of it in this way to different purchasers. Held that Stewart, Brown, & Company, as agents for Biggart & Fulton in paying the price, taking delivery of the sugar, and reselling it at Liverpool, were entitled to recover the sum sued for.

Question whether the pursuers had a title to sue upon the sale-note of 31st March. Stewart, Brown, & Co. v. Biggart & Fulton, Dec. 13, 1893, p. 293.

Shipbroker—Commission.

Contract by an agent for intended company.

4. Held that a limited company had no title to sue upon a contract entered into by a person, as agent for the company, before the company had been incorporated. Tinnevely Sugar Refining Co., Limited, v. Mirrless, Watson, & Yaryan Co., Limited, July 17, 1894, p. 1009.

Sale—Factors Act, 1889, sec. 9—Factors Act, 1890.

5. A sold certain casks of whisky to D, and gave him a delivery-order for the whisky on C, the keeper of A's bonded warehouse. Question whether D was a "mercantile agent in possession" of a document of title in the sense of the Factors Act, 1889, sec. 9. Browne & Co. v. Ainslie & Co., Nov. 28, 1893, p. 173.

Debt collector—Reparation.

6. Taking decree in absence for debt paid after action raised—Malice—Want of probable cause—Issue. Rhind v. Kemp & Co., Dec. 13, 1893, p. 275.
See Agent and Client, 2.

ALIMENT. See Husband and Wife, 4, 5.APPEAL. Execution pending appeal—Prayer for further order.

It is incompetent in a petition for interim execution of a judgment pending an appeal to the House of Lords to add a prayer for any further or other order in the proceedings. Stevenson v. Stevenson, March 7, 1894, p. 617.

Appeal to Court of Session. See Process, 32 to 38.

Appeal to Court of Justiciary. See Justiciary Cases, 15.

APPORTIONMENT. See Lease, 10.APPREHENSION. See Reparation, 27.ARBITRATION. Jurisdiction—Provident Society—Dispute between society and member.

1. The rules of a provident society provided that in the event of any dispute between a member of the society, or any person claiming through a member, and the society, it must be referred to a committee of the society. In an action against the society at the instance of the executor-dative of a member to recover a sum alleged to be due by the society to the deceased, held that, as the defender denied the pursuer's right to represent the deceased member, the question raised was not a dispute within the meaning of the rule, and that the jurisdiction of the Court was not ousted. Symington's Executor v. Galashiels Co-operative Store Co., Limited, Jan. 13, 1894, p. 371.

Nomination of arbiter—Sheriff—Appeal.

2. Under a private Act of Parliament differences were to be referred to an arbiter appointed "by the Sheriff of the county of Lanark." Held that in appointing an arbiter the Sheriff was not acting in his judicial capacity, and that, therefore, an appeal to the Court of Session against his finding was incompetent. Magistrates of Glasgow v. Glasgow District Subway Co., Nov. 8, 1893, p. 52.

Contract—Foreign—Locus solutionis.

3. A contract between an English and a Scots firm to be implemented in Scotland was signed in London and contained this clause:—"Should any dispute arise out of this contract, the same to be settled by arbitration by two members of the London Corn Exchange." In an action by the Scots firm against the English firm, the First Division held (1) that the validity and effect of the contract fell to be determined by the law of Scotland, the locus solutionis; (2) that the arbitration clause could not be regarded as a separate contract, the locus solutionis of which was in England; and (3) that the reference to unnamed arbiters was by the law of Scotland invalid. Held (in rev. the judgment) (1) that the arbitration clause fell to be construed and governed by the law of England, as its terms shewed that that was the intention of the parties; (2) that by the law of England it was valid;

ARBITRATION—Continued.

(3) that there was no principle of public policy to prevent the Courts of Scotland from giving effect to it. Hamlyn & Co. v. Taliaker Distillery, May 10, 1894, H. L., p. 21.

Corruption—Act of Regulation—Arbiter's fee—Personal objection.

4. An arbiter who had accepted a reference without stipulating for any fee intimated to the parties that an award had been signed, and requested payment of a fee of £300 before they uplifted the award. Each of the parties paid one-half of the fee without protest. In an action by one of the parties for reduction of the award on the ground that the arbiter had acted corruptly in the sense of the Act of Regulation in demanding payment of a fee as a condition of allowing the award to be uplifted, held, that as the pursuer had paid his half of the fee without objection he was barred from challenging the award on the ground stated. Duff v. Pirie, Nov. 14, 1893, p. 80.

Ultra fines compromissi.

5. The employer, under a contract for the execution of harbour works, brought an action for reduction of an award of the arbiter named in the contract on the ground that the arbiter had acted ultra vires in ordaining him to execute works. Held that the award was not ultra vires in respect that the order on the pursuer to execute the works was not obligatory, but was merely a condition which he must fulfil before enforcing an order on the contractor. Duff v. Pirie, Nov. 14, 1893, p. 80.

Award—Reduction—Personal objection.

6. In the pleadings before an arbiter, under a reference in an contract for the construction of harbour works, the employer objected to a claim by the contractor on the ground that the claim was excluded by a special agreement between the parties. The contractor denied the existence of such an agreement. The arbiter sustained the contractor's claim. In an action at the instance of the employer for reduction of the award on the ground that the claim was excluded by the express words of the contract, held that the employer having based his case before the arbiter on the alleged special agreement, was barred from pleading the contract as a ground for reducing the award. Duff v. Pirie, Nov. 14, 1893, p. 80.

ARRESTMENT. Salé—Subsalé—Intimation—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 3.

1. In an action by B. & Company, the subvendees of certain whisky, against A. & Company, the original sellers, for delivery of the whisky, which had been arrested by A. & Company in their own bonded stores, A. & Company pleaded that, under the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 3, the subsale not having been intimated to them by or with the authority of B. & Company, it was ineffectual in competition with the arrestments. It was proved that A. & Company knew of the subsale, but that it had not been intimated to them by or with the authority of B. & Company. Held that the arrestments were ineffectual in competition with B. & Company. Browne & Co. v. Ainslie & Co., Nov. 28, 1893, p. 173.

Bankruptcy—Arrestments within sixty days of sequestration—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 108.

2. Held that while arrestments used within sixty days of sequestration are ineffectual to create a preference in the arresting creditor, they are effectual to lay a nexus on the funds to the effect of preventing the arrestee from paying them away to the prejudice of the trustee on the estate, to whom they were transferred by the sequestration. Mackenzie v. Campbell, June 13, 1894, p. 904.

Arrestment of joint property of tenant and landlord for landlord's debt.

3. Under the lease of a quarry the plant was declared to be the joint property of the landlord and of the tenant, the landlord being bound to pay one-half of the value thereof to the tenant at the ish of the lease. Certain creditors of the landlord before the lease ended used arrestments in the hands of the tenant, and then raised an action of furthcoming against the arrestee and the landlord's trustee, in which, without alleging that anything except the plant in the quarries had been attached, they concluded for a decree ordaining the arrestee to pay the whole debt due by the landlord or such part thereof as was represented by money arrested in his hands due by him to the landlord, and to pronounce such other orders as to the Court might "seem necessary for satisfying the said claim of the pursuers." The Court were of opinion that the summons contained no conclusions under which the arrestments, even if competently laid on, could be made available, but allowed the pursuers an opportunity of amending. The pursuers, thereupon, amended their summons, concluding that the Court should ordain that the arrested plant should be sold, and the price thereof, so far as was necessary for the satisfaction of their debt, paid to them, or otherwise should pronounce a like order, upon the pursuers paying to the arrestee half the value of the plant as the same might be ascertained in terms of the lease. The Court assolized the defenders, on the ground that the conclusions were untenable, and that the interest of the landlord in the plant had not been validly arrested. Lucas's Trustees v. Campbell and Scott, July 20, 1894, p. 1096.

BANKRUPTCY. Sequestration—Jurisdiction—Sheriff—Ultra vires—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, secs. 26 and 30.

1. Held that it is ultra vires of a Sheriff to consider the question of jurisdiction in a petition for sequestration until the diet to which the debtor is cited, under sec. 26 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, to shew cause why sequestration should not be awarded. Hope v. Macdougall, Nov. 7, 1893, p. 49.

Sequestration—Reduction—Foreign—Jurisdiction.

2. A, the trustee in a sequestration granted in 1885, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, having realised the bankrupt's estate and distributed it among the creditors, was discharged in 1889. In 1893 B, alleging that he was trustee in a liquidation by arrangement of the debtor's estates instituted in 1881 in the English Courts, brought an action against A for reduction of the sequestration and of the act and warrant appointing the trustee thereunder, on the ground that the Court in Scotland had no jurisdiction to award sequestration in respect of the dependence of the bankruptcy proceedings in England. The Court dismissed the action on the ground that all parties interested had not been called.

Opinions that an action for reduction of a sequestration on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction to award sequestration by reason of the existence of a liquidation in England of the debtor's estates was incompetent. Gibson v. Munro, June 5, 1894, p. 840.

Sequestration—Arrestments within sixty days of sequestration—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 108.

3. Held that while arrestments used within sixty days of sequestration are ineffectual to create a preference in the arresting creditor, they are effectual to lay a nexus on the funds to the effect of preventing the arrestee from paying them away to the prejudice of the trustee on the estate, to whom they were transferred by the sequestration. Mackenzie v. Campbell, June 13, 1894, p. 904.

Sequestration—Effect of.

4. Funds having been handed to a law-agent for the purposes of the client's defence in a criminal charge, and the client having been thereafter sequestered before the trial took place, held that the mandate to the agent fell by the sequestration and consequently that the agent was bound to account to the trustee in the sequestration for all sums in his hands belonging to the client at the date of the sequestration. Mackenzie v. Campbell, June 13, 1894, p. 904.

Trust—Whether trust one for creditors—Jus quesitum tertio—Personal liability of trustee.

5. Circumstances in which it was held that a trustee having represented that the trust in his person was a trust for creditors, and a creditor having intimated her claim to the trustee, he was not entitled to pay over the balance of the trust funds to the truster without satisfying the creditor's claim, and having done so that he was personally liable to her. Cruickshank v. Thomas, Dec. 9, 1893, p. 257.

Trust for creditors—Accession.

6. Provision by father to daughter subject to declaration that all advances by him to son-in-law should be taken in satisfaction—Accession by father to son-in-law's trust for creditors, and part repayment thereunder of advance to son-in-law—Discharge of son-in-law—Held on death of father that the advance, in so far as not repaid under son-in-law's trust, was to be imputed in satisfaction of daughter's provision. Smith's Trustees v. Sellar, March 9, 1894, p. 633.

Trust for creditors—Cautioner.

7. Where the creditors, under a trust for behoof of creditors, entered into a composition arrangement whereby 7s. 6d. per £ was to be paid in four instalments, with cautioners for payment of the last instalment, and after receiving payment of the first instalment only, took a second trust-deed from the debtor, held that they had liberated the cautioners. Allan, Buckley Allan, & Milne, v. Pattison, Nov. 29, 1893, p. 195.

Lease—Balancing of accounts in bankruptcy—Value of buildings erected by tenant.

8. A tenant, several years before the termination of his lease, granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors. The lease having been abandoned by the tenant, it was arranged between the trustee and the landlord that buildings which the tenant would have been entitled to remove at the natural expiration of the lease should be taken over by the landlord at their value. Held that the landlord's agreement to pay the value of the buildings was to be construed as subject to his antecedent right to retain them till the tenant had implemented his obligations under the lease, and that the landlord was entitled to set off against the trustee's claim for the value of the buildings his loss by the tenant's abandonment of the lease. Smith v. Harrison & Co.'s Trustee, Dec. 22, 1893, p. 330.

Cessio—Diligence of prior creditors against property acquired by debtor after decree of cessio—Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, sec. 9, subsec. 5.

9. Held (by a Court of seven Judges) that although, in a process of cessio, a debtor has been decerned to execute a disposition omnium bonorum in favour of a trustee for behoof of his creditors, individual creditors are entitled to do diligence for the recovery of their debts against property acquired by the debtor after the date of the decree. Reid v. Graham, July 3, 1894, p. 935.

BURGH. Dean of Guild—Process—Record.

1. In a petition in a Dean of Guild Court for a lining the burgh surveyor, who was called as a respondent, appeared in Court before the Dean of Guild and stated verbal objections to the granting of the petition, but without having lodged written answers. The Dean of Guild having refused the petition, and the petitioner having appealed, the Court intimated that the surveyor could not be heard unless he lodged written answers, and having of consent of the petitioner allowed the surveyor to put in objections, remitted the cause to the Dean of Guild to make up a record on the petition and answers. Stewart v. Marshall, July 20, 1894, p. 1117.

Ultra vires—Secretary for Scotland—Special Water District—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 81, subsec. 2.

2. Held that a determination of the Secretary for Scotland under the above section, that a police burgh should be represented on the committee in the proportion of eight members to six members appointed by the County Council was ultra vires, and determination reduced. Eastern District Committee of Dumbartonshire County Council v. Police Commissioners of Clydebank, Oct. 19, 1893, p. 12.

Public-House—Licensing authority—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 38.

3. Held that the right of granting, refusing, renewing, and transferring certificates under the Public-Houses Acts for premises within police burghs has not been transferred under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 38, from the county Justices to the magistrates of such burghs. Tennent v. Magistrates of Partick, March 20, 1894, p. 735.

County Council—Assessment—Burgh—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889.

4. Held that under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, a county council is entitled to levy the county general assessment on the annual value of lands and heritages in parliamentary burghs within the county which have less than 7000 inhabitants and have no police establishment. *Police Commissioners of Oban v. CAUTIONER. Liberation of cautioner—Cautioner for composition—Substitution of trust for creditors in place of composition arrangement—Personal objection.

1. A debtor, who had granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, entered into a composition arrangement with them for payment of a composition of 7s. 6d. in the £, and he found caution for the payment of the last instalment, A being one of the cautioners. The debtor failed to pay the first instalment of the composition, and the creditors took from him a second trust-deed for their behoof. No intimation of this was sent to A, but a meeting of the creditors having been subsequently called by circular, one of the circulars was sent to A, who took no notice of it. The debtor's estate realised enough to pay about 2s. 6d. per £. The cautioners having subsequently been called on to pay, A disputed liability, and an action was raised against him. Held that by taking the second trust-deed the creditors had liberated the cautioners, and that A was not barred from pleading this by his silence after receiving the circular. Allan, Buckley Allan, & Milne v. Pattison, Nov. 29, 1893, p. 195.

Act 1695, cap. 5—Septennial Limitation—Contract.

2. Action in which held that a cautionary obligation had been extinguished by the operation of the Act 1695, cap. 5, and that the pursuer had not relevantly averred a new and independent contract with the cautioner under which he would still be liable for the debt. *McGregor's Executors v. CHURCH. Lands held in trust for use and benefit of minister—Mines and minerals.

1. In 1676 certain lands were conveyed in trust “for the use and benefit of the minister of the gospel serving the cure at the Kirk of Bo’ness.” In 1888 minerals in the lands were opened and leased for twenty years at a yearly rent of £25 or royalties. In a special case between the trustees and the minister of the parish, held that the mineral rents or royalties were not to be paid to the minister as part of the income of the benefice, but were to be accumulated as capital, the income of the accumulated fund only being paid to the minister for the time. Galbraith v. Minister of Bo’ness, Oct. 27, 1893, p. 30.

Churchyard—Heritors—Compromise—Ultra vires.

2. Held that it is within the powers of the heritors of a parish to compromise questions regarding the extent of the churchyard, arising with a contentious proprietor, subject to the control of the Court at the instance of anyone having a legitimate interest. Fraser v. Turner, Dec. 13, 1893, p. 278.

Minister—Stipend—“Competent and legal stipend”—Arrears of stipend—Interest—Mora.

3. Where the magistrates of a burgh, who admitted liability to provide a parish minister with a certain limited stipend, were found to be under a contractual obligation to provide him with a “competent and legal stipend suited to the circumstances of the time, and the position and duties of the benefice,” held that the minister was entitled to stipend at the rate of £320 from 1880, when he first made his claim to an increase, down to 1891, when he raised action, and £400 a-year thereafter so long as the circumstances remained the same; and (2) that he was entitled to interest on arrears accruing down to 1891 at the rate of 2 per cent, and to interest on arrears accruing thereafter at the rate of 4 per cent. Peters v. Magistrates of Greenock, June 9, 1894, p. 886.

COMPANY. Railways and Canals—Whether “company” includes commissioners—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854, sec. 21.

1. Held that the words “canal company” in the above section applied to a body of statutory commissioners, who were charged with the administration of a canal when the Act was passed. Commissioners of the Caledonian Canal v. County Councils of Inverness and Argyll, July 18, 1893, p. 1045.

Contract by agent for intended company—Title to sue.

2. In an action of damages against a firm of manufacturing engineers at the instance of a limited company, registered on 29th July 1890, the pursuers averred that, on 14th July 1890, prior to the incorporation of the company, D, as agent for the company, entered into a contract with the defenders for the supply by the latter of certain pieces of machinery, and that the machinery supplied was defective, and had caused great loss to the company. Held (1) that the company had not set forth a title to sue, as D could not have acted as its agent before it was in existence.

General meeting—Quorum—Companies Act, 1862, Schedule I., Table A, Articles 37, 38.

3. Held (1) that in the above provision "members" means members entitled to vote; and (2) that a quorum must not only be present at the commencement of the meeting but also at the time when the business is transacted. Henderson v. Louttit & Co., Limited, March 15, 1894, p. 674.

Articles of Association—Invalid addition to articles—Mutual insurance.

4. The articles of association of a mutual insurance company were altered, and, as altered, were registered in terms of the Companies Acts, but certain of the provisions of these Acts with respect to the alteration of articles of association were not complied with. A policy, issued by the company after the alteration, bore in gremio that the "articles of association shall be deemed, and considered part of this policy," and on the back of the policy the articles (as altered) were printed. In a question between the policy-holder and the company, held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that the altered articles were valid conditions of the insurance. Muirhead v. Forth and North Sea Mutual Insurance Association, Nov. 17, 1893, H. L., p. 1.

Memorandum of Association—Alteration of—Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, sec. 1.

5. A company incorporated in 1866 under the Companies Act, 1862, presented a petition under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, for confirmation of a special resolution of the company altering its memorandum of association by giving it power to acquire and pay for the business of any other company carrying on any business which the company might legally carry on; to sell the business or property of the company; and to amalgamate with any other company in the United Kingdom established for objects similar to its own. The Court refused the petition on the ground that the Act did not contemplate that such general powers should be conferred, although particular transactions of the kinds specified might be sanctioned. Young's Paraffin Light and Mineral Oil Co., Limited, Jan. 16, 1894, p. 384.

Rectification of Register—Prospectus—Material misrepresentation—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 35.

6. B, who had received an allotment of shares in a limited company in March 1893, in June presented a petition to have his name removed from the register of shareholders and for repetition of payments, on the ground that he had been induced to apply for shares by the statement in the prospectus that S, whom he knew to have a high reputation for business ability and integrity, was one of the directors; that he had subsequently learned that prior to the allotment S had intimated to the company that he withdrew his consent to become a director, and that the company had made the allotment to the petitioner without intimating to him that S was not to be a director. The facts above stated having been proved, held that B was entitled to have his petition granted. Blakiston v. London and Scottish Banking and Discount Corporation, Limited, Jan. 24, 1894, p. 417.

Rectification of register—Shares allotted as promotion money—Petition—Competency—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 35.

7. Shareholders of a company presented a petition under the 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862, for rectification of the register of the company by deletion therefrom of the names of certain shareholders, in respect that their shares had been illegally allotted to them as promotion money. The respondents lodged answers in which they denied the petitioners' allegations, stated facts and circumstances tending to shew that they had given good consideration for their shares, and pleaded that the petition was incompetent. The Court held that petition under the 35th section was an inappropriate and inconvenient way of dealing with the statements contained in the petition and answers, and sisted process in order to enable the petitioners to raise an action of reduction in ordinary form. Blakie v. Coats, Nov. 21, 1893, p. 150.

Shares—Fully paid up—Payment in cash—Companies Act, 1867, sec. 25.

8. In the voluntary liquidation of a company, held that as no agreement had been registered under section 25 of the above Act, and as the company had received no payment in cash on account of the shares, and as the allottees were aware of that fact, they fell to be regarded as allottees of unpaid-up shares. Furness & Co. v. Liquidators of "Cynthiana" Steamship Co., Limited, Dec. 8, 1893, p. 239.

Transfer of shares to an insolvent person.

9. The articles of association of a limited company provided that the company might decline, in respect of any shares not fully paid up, to register any transfer made to a bankrupt. Held that the company was not entitled to refuse to register a transfer made to a person who was insolvent but not bankrupt, although the transfer was made for the purpose of freeing the transferor from liability. Furness & Co. v. Liquidators of "Cynthiana" Steamship Co., Limited, Dec. 8, 1893, p. 239.

Reduction of capital—Companies Act, 1867—Companies Act, 1877.

10. A company whose shares consisted of A preference shares, fully paid-up so far as issued, but not all issued, and B postponed shares, all issued and fully paid-up, passed a special resolution to reduce its capital, with the consent of the sole holder of the B shares "(1) by the cancellation as being unrepresented by available assets" of two-fifths of the nominal value of the B shares, and "(2) by paying off, as being in excess of the wants of the company," the remaining three-fifths of the nominal value of the B shares. The company proposed to pay off the three-fifths by borrowing on the security of its heritable property. The only creditors of the company were heritable creditors, and trade creditors whose debts were paid monthly. In a petition the Court confirmed the reduction and authorised the company to discontinue the use of the addition "and reduced" to the company's name after the lapse of six months from the date of the resolution. West End Café Co., Limited (and Reduced), Jan. 16, 1894, p. 381.
11. A limited company, incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1867, passed a special resolution, under sections 9 and 15 of the Companies Act, 1867, by which 10 per cent of its capital was to be returned to its shareholders "upon the footing that the amounts returned, or any part thereof, may be called up again." The Court held that the resolution was competent and fell to be confirmed. Scottish Vulcanite Co., Limited, March 20, 1894, p. 752.

Winding-up by the Court—"Officer of company"—Managing director—Effects to which company prima facie entitled—Retention—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 100.

12. A, the holder of certain patents, who had sold them to a company, and was under an obligation to assign them to it, became its managing director. In a liquidation at the instance of a creditor of the company the liquidator presented a note under the above section craving the Court to ordain A to assign the patents to him. A maintained, first, that the petition was incompetent, in respect (1) that he was not an officer of the company, and (2) that the company was not prima facie entitled to the patents, which he held, not as an officer of the company, but as an undivested seller; and second, that he was entitled to retain the letters-patent in security for the payment of the balance of the price. Held (1) that A was an officer of the company in the sense of the section; (2) that the substantial right to the patents belonged to the company, and that the liquidator was entitled to a decree ordaining A to assign them; but (3) that A was entitled to a reservation of any claim to a preference in the liquidation for the balance of the price which he would have had if he had retained possession of the patents. Dunlop v. Donald, Nov. 15, 1893, p. 125.

Winding-up by the Court—Failure of object of the company—Just and equitable cause—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 79, subsec. 5, sec. 129, subsec. 1.

13. On 13th December 1893 a shareholder, holding 10 out of 215 shares of a limited company, incorporated to own and work a particular ship, presented a petition to have the company wound up by the Court, on the ground that the ship had become a total loss off the coast of North America on 25th November 1893. Answers were lodged by the company, in which they stated that no good reason had been given or existed for a winding-up, and that it would not be just that the company should be wound up by the Court. It appeared that notice of abandonment had not yet been formally accepted by the underwriters who had insured the vessel, and that no meeting of shareholders had been held to consider the question of a voluntary winding-up. The Court refused the petition. Cox v. "Gosford" Ship Co., Jan. 10, 1894, p. 334.

Winding-up by Court—Inability to pay debts—Companies Act, 1862, secs. 79 and 80.

14. A creditor of a company charged the company for payment upon an extract decree, and the inducie having expired without payment, presented a petition for judicial winding-up of the company under the 79th and 80th sections of the Companies Act, 1862. Five other creditors opposed the application, on the grounds that a liquidation would be injurious to the just interests of the creditors, and that the petitioner would gain nothing by it, but they did not aver that there were no assets which could be made available in the liquidation for payment of the petitioner's debts. The Court granted the prayer of the petition. Gardner & Co. v. Link, July 11, 1894, p. 967.

1. The proprietors of a newspaper advertised that £100 would be paid by an insurance company named to the person whom the proprietors of the newspaper "may decide to be the next of kin of anyone who is killed in a railway accident," provided that a copy of the current issue was in his possession at the time of the accident, or that he was a regular subscriber to the newspaper. In an action against the proprietors of the paper, by the children and sole next of kin of a subscriber to the paper, who had been killed by a railway accident, for payment of the sum mentioned in the advertisement, the defence was that the defenders had decided that the widow of the deceased was his next of kin; that under the terms of the advertisement they were entitled so to decide; and that the money had been paid to her. The Court, after a proof, assolized the defenders, being of opinion that it was a condition precedent to requiring payment of the sum mentioned in the advertisement that the person claiming the money should produce the decision of the proprietors of the paper that he was the next of kin of the deceased, and that the pursuers had failed to prove that the defenders in refusing to decide that the pursuers were next of kin of the deceased had acted in bad faith. *Law v. Right in security—Assignment to bond and disposition in security—Unconditional offer and acceptance—Implement—Defect in bond.

5. The holders of a bond and disposition in security having advertised the security subjects for sale, the firm of A & B, who had a reversionary interest in the subjects, in consideration of the bondholders having agreed to withdraw the subjects from sale, bound themselves, by letter, personally to take an assignment of the bond and to pay the amount therein with interest. This was agreed to by letter, and the subjects were withdrawn from sale. Thereafter A & B refused to implement the contract, on the ground that they had discovered that the bond was not a valid security over the subjects quoad the interest, and that its validity in this respect was an implied condition of their obligation. In an action at the instance of the holders of the bond against A & B for implement of the contract, held that A & B were bound to take over the bond whether it was defective or not. Forbes v. Welsh & Forbes, March 8, 1894, p. 630.

Notice—Master and Servant.

6. In defence to an action by a workman against his employers for damages for personal injury, at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, the defenders proved that they had posted at various places in their works, including the pay-box, notices to the effect that from the weekly wages paid to the workmen certain sums would be deducted, to secure certain insurance benefits in case of accident, and that any workman accepting such benefits would be held to have discharged all claims against his employers. It was further proved that the notice was well known to the defenders' workmen generally, and that the pursuer had taken benefit of the insurance. The Court assoluzied the defenders, holding (1) that the conditions founded on were lawful conditions of the contract of employment; and (2) that on the evidence the pursuer must be held to have known of and assented to the conditions. *Wright v. book of time-tables, for the same locality, selling or exposing for sale any time-tables copied or only colourably different from the complainer's time-tables, or containing excerpts therefrom. Held upon a proof (alt. judgment of the First Division) (1) that in so far as the respondents' publication consisted of ordinary time-tables, there had been no infringement of copyright; but (2) that in so far as the respondents' publication consisted of certain pages of selected and condensed information as to tourist arrangements and Saturday excursions, which were proved to have been copied from the complainer's publication, there had been a breach of copyright, and that the complainer was entitled to interdict against the respondents issuing any publication containing the said copyright matter. COUNTY COUNCIL. Ultra vires—Secretary for Scotland—Special Water District—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 81, subsec. 2.

1. Held that a determination of the Secretary for Scotland under the above section, that a police burgh should be represented on the committee in the proportion of eight members to six members appointed by the County Council was ultra vires, and determination reduced. Eastern District Committee of Dumbartonshire County Council v. Police Commissioners of Clydebank, Oct. 19, 1893, p. 12.

1. A voter objecting to a certain person's name being retained on the Register of Voters, instead of signing the notice of objection in the ordinary way, stencilled his name upon it through a perforated signature he had made on a waxed skin. Held that the notice was "signed by the person objecting" in the sense of sec. 4 of the Burgh Voters Act, 1856. 2. Held, upon a construction of the Registration Statutes, that in order to entitle joint tenants and occupants to be registered as voters in respect of lands and heritages held by them jointly, it is necessary that the value of the subjects should be sufficient when divided amongst them to give to each a sum of not less than £14. *Wainwright v. ENTAIL. Disentail—Consent of next heir—Security—Curator ad litem—Personal liability—Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882, sec. 12.

1. An entailed estate was disentailed in 1884, the consent of the next heir, a minor, being given by A, his curator ad litem, who took a bond over the estate as the consideration for the consent. On attaining majority the next heir brought an action against A for payment of £16,000, on the ground that the defender had, in breach of his duty as curator ad litem, failed to obtain proper security for the sum of £16,000. The defender pleaded that the action was irrelevant, in respect that he was protected by section 12 of the Entail Act, 1882, there being no averment that he had acted corruptly. Held that the action was irrelevant. Maxwell Heron v. Dunlop, Dec. 8, 1893, p. 230.

Multiplepoinding.

2. Observed that where an action of multiplepoinding was competently brought, the invariable rule was that the expenses of bringing the action fell to be paid out of the fund in medio. Shaw v. Rex, July 17, 1894, p. 1024.

Taxation—Process—A. S., July 15, 1876, General Regulation, 5.

3. The defender of an action, who, besides denying the pursuer's averments on the merits, pleaded that the action was incompetent, did not reclaim against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary repelling the plea to competency and allowing a proof. The Lord Ordinary, having heard the proof, gave judgment for the pursuer. At the hearing upon a reclaiming note against that judgment the defender insisted in his objection to the competency of the action, but admitted that his defences on the merits could not be entertained in the absence of a third party. The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, dismissed the action as incompetent, and found the defender entitled to expenses. The pursuer objected to the Auditor's report on the defender's account of expenses in respect that under the A. S., July 15, 1876, General Regulation 5, the Auditor ought to have taxed off the whole expenses of the proof. The Court repelled the objection, holding that the question raised was one which it was for the Court to decide when disposing of the motion for expenses, and not for the Auditor, and that the objection came too late, the Court having finally disposed of the motion for expenses. Welsh v. Russell, May 19, 1894, p. 769.

Fees to counsel—Jury trial.

4. A jury trial for damages for personal injury lasted for part of a day at the sittings. In taxing the successful party's account of expenses, the Auditor reduced the fee of senior counsel from twenty guineas to thirteen, and that of junior counsel from fifteen guineas to eight. The successful party objected to the reduction, maintaining that it had been fixed by decisions of the Court that twenty guineas and fifteen guineas respectively were the proper fees to be allowed against the losing party in all ordinary jury trials which did not extend beyond a single day, and that this rule ought to be applied in the present case, the Auditor not having reported that there was anything exceptional in the case. The Court refused to interfere with the discretion of the Auditor. Blair v. Caledonian Railway Company, Oct. 26, 1893, p. 23.

Time of lodging objections to the Auditor's report—A. S., Feb. 6, 1806.

5. Held that, as a general rule, objections must be lodged within forty-eight hours, and that the forty-eight hours run from the date of the Auditor's issuing his report, and not from the date when the report is lodged in process.

1. In a question between a riparian proprietor and a member of the public held (1) that a right in the public of being at or on the non-tidal portion of a river for the purposes of navigation does not entitle them to fish for trout therein, and (2) that such a right of fishing cannot be acquired by prescriptive use. *Grant v. Salmon-fishing ex adverso of adjacent lands—Title to sue—Possession—Prescription.

2. In an action to which the Crown was not a party, held that even assuming the defender to have no right to the salmon-fishings claimed, as the pursuer had failed to produce an express grant to the fishings, or to shew by exclusive possession for the prescriptive period that his general title to salmon-fishings included them, the defender was entitled to absolvitor.

Opinion that a right of salmon-fishing was an estate in land in the sense of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, and that possession of salmon-fishings for twenty years was prescriptive possession thereof. Ogston v. Stewart's Trustees, Dec. 13, 1893, p. 282.

Jurisdiction—Reconvention.

2. In an action raised by an English firm in the Sheriff Court the pursuers obtained a final judgment on the merits, with a finding of expenses. While the pursuers' account of expenses was before the Auditor the defender brought an action relating to the same subject-matter against the pursuers as subject to the jurisdiction of the Court ex reconventionem. Held that notwithstanding the judgment on the merits the action of reconvention was competent. Allan v. Wormser Harris & Co., June 8, 1894, p. 866.
3. An English firm raised an action in Scotland against a Scotsman, but before final judgment the firm was dissolved, one of the partners continuing the business under the original firm name. No notice of the dissolution was given to the defender of the action, and, ex facie of the proceedings, the firm continued to litigate to the end. The defender thereafter raised an action in Scotland against the firm by its firm name, pleading that jurisdiction existed ex reconventionem. Held that jurisdiction ex reconventionem existed notwithstanding the dissolution of the firm. Allan v. Wormser Harris & Co., June 8, 1894, p. 866.

Agent and Principal—Liability for disclosed principal—Agent and Client—Custom—English custom applicable to solicitors.

4. In an action by an English solicitor against a law-agent in Scotland for payment of an account for professional services, the pursuer averred that he had been employed by the defender to conduct a litigation in England for a client, and that by the custom of England a solicitor employing another for a client was personally liable to the solicitor employed for costs. After a proof, held that the pursuer had failed to prove that the custom extended to the case of an English solicitor employed by a Scots law-agent. *Livesey v. FRAUD. Undue influence—Facility—Nurse and patient—Issue—Reduction.

In an action for reduction of a will the pursuer averred that the testatrix had, through excessive drinking, become deteriorated in her mental and physical condition, and facile and yielding in her disposition; that the defender, three months before the death of the testatrix, had been engaged to attend her as nurse; that taking advantage of her position of nurse, and of the patient's craving for alcohol, she had plied her with drink, and that by this means, by excluding her relations, and by various false stories, she had induced the patient to make a will in her favour. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Wellwood) that the pursuer was not entitled to an issue of undue influence, but only to an issue of facility and fraud or circumvention. M'Callum v. Graham, May 30, 1894, p. 824.

GOODWILL. Trust—Trustees—Liability—Goodwill of business carried on by trustee.

1. An engineer who had been many years in India, on his return to this country, continued to supply native and other traders in India with cotton presses, which he bought from makers in this country. At the time of his death his average income from this source was about £300 per annum.

GOODWILL—Continued.

In an action of accounting brought some years after his death by the beneficiaries under his settlement against his trustees, the pursuers contended that the trustees were bound to account for the value of the goodwill of the testator's business which they had not sold. After a proof, held that the goodwill was an asset of the deceased's estate which should have been sold by the trustees, and that they fell to be debited with £300 as the value thereof. Donald v. Hodgart's Trustees, Dec. 8, 1893, p. 246.

Public-house—Transfer of certificate—Heir and executor.

2. A wine and spirit-merchant, who carried on business in a public-house, of which he was proprietor, died intestate on 7th December 1891. His widow entered into possession of the business, and on 16th February 1892 she succeeded in obtaining from the licensing magistrates, in competition with her husband's executor, a transfer of his certificate. The widow died on 23d February, and her executor then entered into possession of the business, stock, and fittings, and carried on the business till 16th May, when he sold the goodwill, stock in trade, &c., to a purchaser for £1500. The widow's executor had prior to this sale made and carried out an arrangement with the husband's heir-at-law, whereby the latter agreed to grant to the purchaser of the goodwill a new lease of the premises for seven years, in consideration of a sum of £250 paid by the widow's executor. In an action of accounting raised by the husband's executor against the widow's executor, held (1) that the defender was not bound to account for any profits made after the widow obtained a transfer of the certificate; and (2) that the defender was not bound to account for any part of the price received for the goodwill of the business sold by him. Philp's Executor v. Philp's Executor, Feb. 1, 1894, p. 482.

Refetation—General lien—Fraud—Lessee holding himself out as true owner—Rollers for calico printing—Custom of trade.

2. W. M. let out on hire to M. J. & Co., calico printers, certain copper rollers, on an agreement that the rollers should be marked with his name, and that in the event of M. J. & Co. parting with the custody of the rollers to any third person they should be delivered under a receipt bearing that they were "received from W. M." M. J. & Co., who had no printing works of their own, in accordance with a custom of the trade, sent their cloth with the rollers to be printed by H. & Sons, to whom they falsely represented that the rollers were their own property. M. J. & Co. having become insolvent, H. & Sons refused to deliver the rollers to W. M., on the ground that by an admitted custom of trade calico printers employed to print for others had a general lien over the cloth and rollers sent to them. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Low) that as M. J. & Co. had no power to subject W. M.'s rollers to the lien of H. & Sons, and as W. M. had done nothing to mislead H. & Sons into the belief that the rollers were the property of M. J. & Co., he was entitled to recover them. Mitchell v. Heys & Sons, Feb. 27, 1894, 21 R. 600.

tion, it was proved that the husband had treated his wife with cruelty, and when drunk had turned her out of his house, and that for more than four years thereafter the spouses had lived separate. Evidence on which the Court refused to grant decree of divorce on the ground that the spouses had been living separately of mutual consent. Gibson v. Gibson, Feb. 1, 1894, p. 470.

2. In an action for divorce on the ground of desertion by a wife against her husband, evidence upon which it was held, distinguishing from the case of Gibson v. Gibson, supra, No. 1, that the husband, who had expelled his wife from the house, and had acted with great cruelty towards her, had so acted with the view of putting an end to conjugal cohabitation, and, consequently, that she was entitled to decree of divorce. Murray v. Murray, March 17, 1894, p. 723.

Custody of Child—Cruelty to Wife—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, sec. 5.

4. A married woman commenced a suit in the English Courts for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty. The husband objected to the jurisdiction on the ground that his domicile was in Scotland. The husband subsequently presented a petition to the Court of Session for the custody of the children against his wife, who had removed them from his custody under pretence of taking them on a visit to her father. The wife, in answer, averred that on some occasions the petitioner had treated the children with cruelty, and further made specific statements of cruelty to herself. The Court granted the prayer of the petition. In an appeal the House, holding that the wife's averments of cruelty to herself were relevant in answer to the husband's petition for the custody of his children, and considering it expedient that the inquiry into the husband's conduct should be made in the wife's proceedings for judicial separation, in which the question as to the custody of the children might also be determined, recalled the interlocutor of the First Division, on the wife undertaking to abandon the proceedings in England, and to raise and duly prosecute an action of separation in Scotland, and directed the Court to sist the husband's petition in hoc statu.

Held further that having regard to the interests of the children, the eldest of whom was not more than eight years of age, the interim custody should remain with the mother. Stevenson v. Stevenson, June 5, 1894, H. L., p. 96.

Aliment—Maintenance of lunatic widow.

4. A husband died intestate and childless, survived by his widow, who was of unsound mind, and was confined in a lunatic asylum. She had no means of subsistence other than her right to a half of her husband's estate, which amounted to £200. In a special case between her curator bonis and the deceased's next of kin, held that the maintenance of the widow was not a burden on the husband's estate, and that the next of kin were entitled to immediate payment of one-half thereof. Howard's Executor v. Howard's Curator Bonis, May 25, 1894, p. 787.

Aliment—Separation—Parent and Child.

5. Under a voluntary deed of separation and aliment, dated in August 1891, a wife was entitled to the income of £1000 vested by the husband in trustees. In October 1891 the wife gave birth to a daughter, and in May 1893 an action was raised in name of the daughter, with her mother's concurrence, against the father for aliment. In this action the pursuer alleged that no provision had been made for her aliment, and that her father was possessed of means between £2000 and £3000. Held (1) that the action was to be regarded as an application by the mother for additional aliment; (2) that the agreement made in August 1891 must be held to have been made in contemplation of the birth of the child; and (3) that no relevant ground had been stated for giving additional aliment. Scott v. Scott, June 6, 1894, p. 853.

6. A married woman claimed, as against the trustee in her husband's sequestration, £70 of the contents of two deposit-receipts for £305 and £145 respectively, which bore that the contents had been received from the spouses, and were payable to either or the survivor. She averred that she was possessed of £70 at her marriage, that she had after her marriage placed it on the deposit-receipts, and that the remaining contents of the deposit-receipts were donations to her by her husband. Held that, assuming that she had placed £70 of her own property on the deposit-receipts, her statement shewed that it had not been kept separate from her husband's estates, and consequently that she was not entitled to a proof. National Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Cowan, Oct. 18, 1893, p. 4.

7. In the case of a marriage contracted in 1885 held that furniture which had belonged to the wife before her marriage, and had been taken by her to the house in which she and her husband lived after marriage, had not been immixed with her husband's funds nor lent or entrusted to him, in the sense of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec. 1, and did not pass, on his sequestration, to his trustee. Adam v. Adam's Trustee, March 16, 1894, p. 676.

Sale—Delivery—Possession—Conveyance to marriage-contract trustees retenta possessione.

8. In December 1883 M's estates were sequestrated, but before a trustee had been appointed a deed of arrangement was executed between M and his creditors and B. By this deed M assigned his furniture to B in consideration of payment of a sum exceeding its value by way of composition to the creditors. B thereafter assigned the furniture to the trustees under M's antenuptial marriage-contract for behoof of M's wife in liferent, and of the children of the marriage in fee, M's jus mariti being excluded. The furniture was allowed to remain in the house then occupied by M and his wife, which belonged to the trustees, and on the spouses removing to another house in 1884 the furniture was taken with them. In 1890 M sold the furniture to G, and G let the furniture on hire to M. The furniture remained with M and his wife. In an action by the marriage-contract trustees to have G interdicted from removing the furniture, held that the right to the furniture was in the trustees, in respect that since the date of the assignation in their favour M's wife had been in actual possession of it as liferentrix, and that the trustees had accordingly been in civil possession through her, and that G therefore had no title to it, and interdict granted. Mitchell's Trustees v. Gladstone, Feb. 27, 1894, p. 586.

Jus mariti—Marriage-contract.

9. By antenuptial marriage-contract a wife conveyed the whole funds payable to her under her father's settlement to trustees for the purpose, inter alia, that the revenue of £5000 (being the portion of the funds available at the date of the contract) should be paid to herself exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of her husband, the clear revenue of the remainder to be held for the joint behoof of the spouses and paid to them on their joint receipt. The husband expressly renounced his jus mariti and right of administration, in so far as the capital of the whole funds and the revenue of the £5000 were concerned, but the deed was silent as to the husband's rights with respect to the revenue of the remainder of the funds. Held that the husband's jus mariti and right of administration did not affect funds conveyed to the trustees by the antenuptial contract of marriage or the revenue thereof, and that he had no interest in them except under the trust. Bruce's Trustees v. Bruce's Trustee, Feb. 27, 1894, p. 593.

INSURANCE. Constitution of contract—Advertisement—Condition precedent—Next of kin.

1. The proprietors of a newspaper advertised that £100 would be paid by an insurance company named to the person whom the proprietors of the newspaper "may decide to be the next of kin of anyone who is killed in a railway accident," provided that a copy of the current issue was in his possession at the time of the accident, or that he was a regular subscriber to the newspaper. In an action against the proprietors of the paper, by the children and sole next of kin of a subscriber to the paper, who had been killed by a railway accident, for payment of the sum mentioned in the advertisement, the defence was that the defenders had decided that the widow of the deceased was his next of kin; that under the terms of the advertisement they were entitled so to decide; and that the money had been paid to her. The Court, after a proof, assolized the defenders, being of opinion that it was a condition precedent to requiring payment of the sum mentioned in the advertisement that the person claiming the money should produce the decision of the proprietors of the paper that he was the next of kin of the deceased, and that the pursuers had failed to prove that the defenders in refusing to decide that the pursuers were next of kin of the deceased had acted in bad faith. Law v. George Newnes, Limited, July 17, 1894, p. 1027.

Mutual insurance—Conditions in policy—Company—Articles of association imported into policy—Invalid addition to articles.

2. The articles of association of a mutual insurance company were altered, and, as altered, were registered in terms of the Companies Acts, but certain of the provisions of these Acts with respect to the alteration of articles of association were not complied with. A policy, issued by the company after the alteration, bore in gremio that the "articles of association shall be deemed and considered part of this policy," and on the back of the policy the articles (as altered) were printed. In a question between the policy-holder and the company, held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that the altered articles were valid conditions of the insurance. Muirhead v. Forth and North Sea Mutual Insurance Association, Nov. 17, 1893, H. L., p. 1.

Notice—Reparation—Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880.

3. In defence to an action by a workman against his employers for damages for personal injury, at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, the defenders proved that they had posted at various places in their works, including the pay-box, notices to the effect that from the weekly wages paid to the workmen certain sums would be deducted, to secure certain insurance benefits in case of accident, and that any workman accepting such benefits would be held to have discharged all claims against his employers. It was further proved that the notice was well known to the defenders' workmen generally, and that the pursuer had taken benefit of the insurance. The Court assolized the defenders, holding (1) that the conditions founded on were lawful conditions of the contract of employment; and (2) that on the evidence the pursuer must be held to have known of and assented to the conditions. Wright v. Howard, Baker, & Co., Oct. 26, 1893, p. 25.

Marine insurance—Policy—Declared value.

4. A shipowner insured a steamer with a mutual insurance company. The policy provided that the vessel, "for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and the company in this policy," should be valued at £3750. In a question between the assured and the company as to whether the assured had violated a condition of the policy, which required him to keep one-fifth of the value of the steamer uninsured, held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the value of the vessel must be taken to be the value declared in the policy. Muirhead v. Forth and Accident insurance—Post-mortem examination—Contract—Condition precedent.

5. A person insured against death by accident fell into a river, while fishing, and his dead body was subsequently recovered. In an action upon the policy, the insurance company, in defence, averred that his death resulted from disease and not from drowning. Evidence on which held that death from drowning was instructed without a post-mortem examination.

An accident assurance policy contained the following condition:—"In the case of death the legal representatives of the assured . . . shall furnish all such other information and evidence as the directors may require from time to time, or may consider necessary or proper to elucidate the case." Opinion (per Lord Young) that upon a sound reading of the condition the refusal by the representatives of a person insured to comply with a demand by the company for a post-mortem examination, in circumstances which made the demand not unreasonable, did not of itself liberate the company from the obligations in the policy. Ballantine v. Employers' Insurance Co. of Great Britain, Limited, Dec. 15, 1893, p. 305.

Insurance of deposit-receipt—Default by bank—Reconstruction of bank.

6. An insurance company guaranteed payment to a depositor of the deposit-receipt of a bank "after default" in payment by the bank. The bank stopped payment and failed to pay the deposit-receipt at due date. It was afterwards reconstructed. In an action against the insurance company at the instance of the depositor, held that the bank was in default, and that the pursuer was entitled to a decree for the amount of his deposit-receipt. Young v. Trustee, Assets, and Investment Insurance Co., Limited, Dec. 8, 1893, p. 222.

INTERDICT. Summary Procedure—Competency of civil action for interdict where statute provides a penalty on summary conviction—Patent.

The Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888, sec. 1, by subsec. 1, enacts that a person should not be entitled to describe himself as a patent-agent unless he is registered, and by subsec. 4, enacts that if any person knowingly describes himself as a patent-agent in contravention of this section, he shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £20. An action for declarator that the defender was not entitled to describe himself as a patent-agent so long as he was not registered, and for interdict against him so describing himself, dismissed as incompetent, on the ground that the statute in making the use of the designation patent-agent by a person not registered a criminal offence, and subjecting the person so using it to a penalty, did not confer any civil right upon other persons to prevent him from using it. Institute of Patent-Agents v. Lockwood, June 11, 1894, H. L., 61.

Appointment—Factor on estate of person sui juris—Contempt of Court—Custody of child—Recall.

2. A father presented a petition for the custody of his pupil child and obtained decree against an aunt of the child ordaining her to deliver the child to him. The aunt not having done so, the Court ordered her to attend personally at the bar, and on her failure to obey this order sequestered her estates, and appointed a judicial factor thereon. Thereafter the aunt presented a petition for the recall of the sequestration and the factory. She explained that she had not received service of the order to attend, and that her health made it dangerous for her to attend, and by her counsel she submitted herself unreservedly to the judgment of the Court. The father lodged answers, in which he submitted that the petition ought not to be granted until the aunt had handed over the child to him. It appeared that the child, who had now attained twelve years of age, had resided with the aunt for eight years, and had a decided wish to remain with her. The Court, without requiring the aunt's personal presence, and without requiring her to deliver up the child, granted her petition. Edgar v. Fisher's Trustees, Nov. 10, 1893, p. 59, and Fisher v. Edgar, July 20, 1894, p. 1076.

Appointment—Factor on estate of one said to be facile and subject to undue influence—Marriage-contract.

3. A petition for the appointment of a judicial factor on the estate of a widow eighty-six years of age was presented by all her children, except her youngest son, averring that owing to her facility and the undue influence of her youngest son, she was gratuitously alienating her estate to the prejudice of the marriage-contract rights of her other children. The widow denied the averments as to her health and facility and as to the conduct of her youngest son, and stated that her estate belonged to her absolutely. The Court dismissed the petition in respect (1) that it was not clear upon the deeds what the rights of the petitioners were, and that the petition was not an appropriate process for their ascertainment; and (2) that the other averments as to the widow's liability to undue influence were not relevant

4. Under a trust-deed an aunt was sole tutor and curator to a pupil niece, quoad the trust-estate. The aunt having removed the child out of the jurisdiction of the Court, and having failed to comply with an order of Court to restore the child, her estates were sequestrated and a judicial factor appointed thereon. In a petition at the instance of the father of the child, the Court, without removing the aunt from her office, appointed the judicial factor on her estate to be factor loco tutoris to the child. Thereafter the aunt having purged the contempt of Court, the appointment of the factor loco tutoris was recalled. Edgar v. Fisher's Trustees, Dec. 20, 1893, p. 325, and *Fisher v. Special powers—Sale of heritages not in accordance with power conferred by Court—Approval of sale.

5. A judicial factor having obtained power from the Court to expose certain heritable subjects for sale by public roup at the upset price of £9750, and if not sold, to re-expose the subjects at a reduced upset price, or to sell the same by private bargain at a price not less than the sum at which they had been publicly exposed for sale, sold the subjects before exposing them by public roup to a private purchaser for £9800. The property was bonded much above its value, and the postponed bondholders approved of the sale. Petition for approval of the sale refused.

7. In 1893 the judicial factor on a trust-estate, who was appointed in 1877, and whose factory did not fall under the Pupils Protection Act, 1849, presented a petition for delivery of his bond of caution, stating that his duties had come to an end, and that he had obtained a discharge from the beneficiary, which he produced. He did not ask for a judicial discharge. The Court refused to grant a warrant without first making a remit to the Accountant of Court to examine the factor's accounts.

Observed that the effect of the Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act, 1889, is to subject all factories alike to the supervision of the Accountant of Court, and that it is in his discretion to say whether a full audit may be dispensed with. Aitken, Nov. 10, 1893, p. 62.

9. The next heir in certain disentail proceedings, on reaching majority, raised an action against his curator ad litem in these proceedings for payment of £16,000, averring that he had sustained loss to that amount through the defender's breach of duty in failing to take adequate security for the sum paid for the consent to the disentail. The defender pleaded that under the above section the action was irrelevant, there being no averment that he had acted corruptly. Action dismissed as irrelevant. *Maxwell Heron v. 2. The rules of a provident society provided that in the event of any dispute between a member of the society, or any person claiming through a member, and the society, it must be referred to a committee of the society. In an action against the society at the instance of the executor-dative of a member to recover a sum alleged to be due by the society to the deceased, held that, as the defenders denied the pursuer's right to represent the deceased member, the question raised was not a dispute within the meaning of the rule, and that the jurisdiction of the Court was not ousted. *Symington's Executor v. Reconvention—Foreign.

6. An English firm raised an action in Scotland against a Scotchman, but before final judgment the firm was dissolved, one of the partners continuing the business under the original firm name. No notice of the dissolution was given to the defender of the action, and, ex facie of the proceedings, the firm continued to litigate to the end. The defender thereafter raised an action in Scotland against the firm by its firm name, pleading that jurisdiction existed ex reconventione. Held that jurisdiction ex reconventione existed notwithstanding the dissolution of the firm. Allan v. Wormser Harris & Co., June 8, 1894, p. 866.
7. In an action raised by an English firm in the Sheriff Court the pursuers obtained a final judgment on the merits, with a finding of expenses. While the pursuers' account of expenses was before the Auditor the defender brought an action relating to the same subject-matter against the pursuers as subject to the jurisdiction of the Court ex reconventione. Held that notwithstanding the judgment on the merits the action of reconvention was competent. Allan v. Wormser Harris & Co., June 8, 1894, p. 866.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Reduction—Foreign.

JUSTICIARY CASES. Jurisdiction—Sheriff—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, secs. 447, 454, 508, and 509.

1. The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, does not deprive the Sheriff of a county of jurisdiction to try persons for offences committed within a burgh in the county. Cameron v. Macniven, Jan. 23, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 31.

Crimes and offences—Reset of theft—Proof—Previous conviction—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, sec. 19.

2. Held that under the above section previous convictions may be proved if evidence has been given that the accused had the stolen goods in his possession, actually or constructively, at any time after they had been stolen. Watson v. Her Majesty's Advocate, Jan. 23, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 26.

Crimes and offences—Coal Mines Regulations Act, 1887.

3. In 1871 a mine owner entered into an agreement with his miners by which the parties agreed that an average uniform deduction of 56 lbs. should be made from the gross contents of each hutch sent up from the pit in respect of stones and substances in the hutch other than coal. In an appeal by the manager against a conviction of a contravention of section 12 of the above Act, the Court quashed the conviction, holding that the agreement was lawful, and that deductions made in terms thereof did not infer a contravention of the Act in cases where the miner was paid on a smaller amount of coal than he had actually sent up. Ronaldson v. Mowat, July 13, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 55.
4. A coalowner entered into an agreement with his miners, by which no payment should be made for the excess weight of any hutch beyond 10 cwt., and the practice was when a hutch was found to contain more than 10 cwt. to carry the weighing of it no further. In an appeal by the manager against a conviction of offences against section 12 and section 13, subsection 1, of the above Act, held (1) that the conviction of the first offence was bad, in respect that the agreement for deductions was valid, overfilling being "improper filling" in the sense of the Act, and the failure to weigh or pay for the contents of the hutches beyond the maximum of 10 cwts. was not a contravention of section 12; and (2) that the conviction of the second offence was bad, the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Wellwood holding that the checkweigher's duty to see that the agreement as to deductions was properly carried out did not require him to ascertain the exact weight of hutches weighing over 10 cwt., Lord Adam holding that the second charge was not relevant, as the accused was not bound to weigh the coal in the hutches separately from the other contents thereof. Atkinson v. Hastie, July 13, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 62.

Apprehension.

5. Apprehension without a warrant. Leask v. Burt, Oct. 28, 1893, p. 32.

Conviction.

6. The record of a conviction may competently be altered after the accused has left the bar, if the alteration is verbal only and not in substance. M'Giveran v. Auld, July 20, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 69.

Petition for recall of sentence of outlawry.

7. A panel against whom sentence of outlawry had been pronounced in consequence of his failure to appear and answer to an indictment charging him with attempt to murder and murder along with another panel against whom the trial had subsequently proceeded, petitioned the Court to recall the sentence on the ground that at the time of the trial he was furth of Scotland, but was now willing to surrender himself for trial. No appearance was made for the Crown, to whom the petition was duly intimated. The Court recalled the sentence, and reponed the panel thereagainst. Sweeney v. Her Majesty's Advocate, May 21, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 44.

Precognition of witnesses.

to give information to the other side. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Monson, Dec. 23, 1893, Just. Cases, p. 5.

Proof—List of productions—Photograph.

9. Held that it was incompetent to examine a witness as to the likeness in a photograph which could not be produced, not being in the list of productions. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Monson, Dec. 23, 1893, Just. Cases, p. 5.

Proof—Question tending to prove crime not charged—Competency.

10. In a trial for murder, the prosecutor proposed to ask a witness whether a certain document which was pertinent to the case and which bore the name of the witness as a signature was in fact signed by him, the suggestion being that the signature was forged by the prisoner. Held that as the crime of forgery had not been charged against the prisoner the question was incompetent. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Monson, Dec. 23, 1893, Just. Cases, p. 5.

Proof—Hearsay—Fugitive.

11. Of two persons charged with the crime of murder, one disappeared and was declared an outlaw. During the trial which proceeded against the other, the prosecutor stated that he had without success exhausted all possible resources for finding the fugitive, and he proposed to elicit from a witness who knew him a statement made by the fugitive to the witness shortly after the alleged murder. Held that the evidence was incompetent, in respect (1) that statements made in the panel's absence could not be evidence against him; and (2) that the failure to find a person did not make hearsay evidence as to statements made by him competent. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Monson, Dec. 23, 1893, Just. Cases, p. 5.

Proof—Questions in cross-examination affecting character of witness.

12. At a trial for assault alleged to have been committed upon a doctor sent by a parochial board to vaccinate a child, by the child's father, the doctor was asked in cross-examination whether he was at the time of the alleged assault under the influence of drink. He answered in the negative. The following questions were then put to the doctor,—"Were you under the influence of drink during any part of the day? What quantity of intoxicating drink had you that day?" The Sheriff-substitute disallowed the questions, and thereafter convicted the accused. The accused appealed upon a case stated. The case did not set forth the grounds upon which the Sheriff-substitute had disallowed the questions. Held that as there was nothing in the case to shew that the questions were not legitimate, and as the answer to them might have affected the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, the conviction fell to be set aside. Falconer v. Brown, Oct. 30, 1893, Just. Cases, p. 1.

Proof—Evidence at former trial.

13. Parole proof of evidence given at a former trial is competent. M'Giveran v. Auld, July 20, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 69.

Proof—Telephone.

14. Held that the evidence of a person who deposed that he had heard words through a telephone, and thought that he recognised the voice, was competent evidence as to the identity of the person speaking through the telephone. M'Giveran v. Auld, July 20, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 69.

Appeal—Case stated—Criminal cause—Public Health Act, 1867, secs. 16, 18, 106, 107, and 108—Housing of the Working-Classes Act, 1890, sec. 32 and schedule 3—Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875, secs. 2 and 3.

summary complaints under the Act, when of a criminal nature or for penalties, may be brought at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, or at the instance of any party aggrieved, with the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal. Held that where the complaint is at the instance of a party aggrieved, the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal must be given before service of the complaint on the accused, and that it is incompetent to amend the complaint by the procurator-fiscal appending his concurrence when the complaint is called for trial. Lundie v. M'Brayne, Jan. 23, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 33.

Summary Procedure—Limitation of time—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 24—Prevention of Cruelty to and Protection of Children Act, 1889, sec. 1.

17. A person was on 29th March 1894 served with a complaint which charged him with a contravention of the Prevention of Cruelty to and Protection of Children Act, 1889, in that he "did between the 1st August 1893 and the 28th February 1894 . . . wilfully ill-treat, neglect, and expose A B, a boy under fourteen years of age, so as to cause unnecessary suffering and injury to his health by beating him, failing to supply him with necessary food and clothing, and otherwise ill-using him." The Sheriff found the accused "guilty of the contravention charged to the extent of wilfully ill-treating the said" A B "so as to cause unnecessary suffering by beating him." In a suspension the Court quashed the conviction, in respect that looking to the terms of the complaint and the terms of the conviction it was impossible to say that the Sheriff might not have convicted the accused on the strength of ill-treatment between 1st August 1893 and 29th September 1893, which latter date was six months before the date of the complaint. Farquharson v. Gordon, June 4, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 52.

Summary Procedure—Complaint—Relevancy—"On Sunday or about that time"—Public-Houses Act Amendment Act, 1862.

18. A person was convicted of a breach of his certificate upon a complaint which set forth that he did sell liquor "upon Sunday 31st day of December 1893, or about that time." Held in an appeal by him upon a case stated under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, that the complaint was irrelevant in respect that the words "or about that time" must be taken as including the days immediately before and after the Sunday specified, and therefore as including hours on Saturday and Monday when the sale would not have been an offence. Macdonald v. Patterson, March 5, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 38.

Summary Procedure—Penalty—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, section 4, schedule A—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881, section 6—Day Trespass Act, section 1.

19. Suspension, on the ground that the complaint contained no statement that the term of imprisonment, which the accused might be adjudged to suffer in default of paying a fine of £2, fell in terms of section 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1881 to be restricted to one month refused, on the ground that the Sheriff-substitute's attention had been sufficiently called to the restriction of the penalty by the Act of 1881 in the reference to that Act in the heading of the complaint. M'Ewen v. Lord Abinger, Jan. 19, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 14.

Summary Procedure—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 16.

20. In trials under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts articles produced in evidence are properly noted in the record of the proceedings, although the evidence may have failed to connect them with the accused. M'Giveran v. Auld, July 20, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 69.

Summary Procedure—Competency of civil action for interdict where statute provides a penalty on summary conviction—Patent.

21. The Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888, sec. 1, by subsec. 1, enacts that a person should not be entitled to describe himself as a patent-agent unless he is registered, and by subsec. 4 enacts that if any person knowingly describes himself as a patent-agent in contravention of this section, he shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £20. An action for declarator that the defender was not entitled to describe himself as a patent-agent so long as he was not registered, and for interdict against him so describing himself dismissed as incompetent on the ground that the statute in making the use of the designation patent-agent by a person not registered a criminal offence, and subjecting the person so using it to a penalty, did not confer any civil right upon other persons to prevent him from using it. Institute of Patent-Agents v. Lockwood, June 11, 1894, H. L., p. 61.

Summary Procedure—Conviction.

22. Objection to a conviction that it was a general conviction of an alternative charge repelled. McGiverau v. Auld, July 20, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 69.

LEASE. Constitution—Whether one partner can bind firm.

1. Where one only of two joint adventurers signed a lease for a period of years of premises in which to carry on the business of the joint adventure, and, upon the termination of the joint adventure at the end of the first year of the lease, the other joint adventurer was sued for the amount of the rent for that year, held after a proof that the defender was liable in the sum sued for, but question whether he was liable as tenant under the lease. Cooke's Circus Buildings Co., Limited, v. Welding, Jan. 11, 1894, p. 339.

Invalid lease—Liability of tenant to implement obligations.

2. The lease of a mansion-house and shootings granted by trustees, after being acted on for fourteen years, was reduced on the ground that it had been ultra vires of the trustees to grant it. In an action of damages at their instance against the tenant, held that the tenant, who had had no other title of possession to the subjects, was bound by its terms during the period of his occupancy. Elliott's Trustees v. Elliott, June 7, 1894, p. 858.

Exclusion of assignees except with consent of landlord—Landlord's right to withhold consent.

3. The proprietor of a granite quarry let it to a company, the lease containing a clause "expressly excluding (except with the consent of the proprietor in writing) assignees, legal or conventional. . . ." The company having gone into liquidation, the landlord's agents wrote a letter to the liquidators intimating that he was willing to consent to the sale of the lease, but on the condition "that the assignee must be a person approved by him." The liquidators thereafter sold the lease, and granted an assignation to the purchasers without the landlord's approval. In an action by the landlord for reduction of the assignation, the defenders averred that the landlord in refusing to recognise the defenders as assignees "is acting in fraud of his arrangement with the liquidators," and that "the true reason of the pursuer's refusal is this—that he has come under some obligation to give a lease of the quarry to" another person. "It is solely for the purpose of implementing this obligation that the pursuer is unfairly and unreasonably withholding his approval of the assignees tendered by the liquidators." Held that as the assignation had been granted to assignees not approved by the landlord it fell to be reduced. Marquis of Breadalbane v. Whitehead & Sons, Nov. 16, 1893, p. 138.

Subject—Lease of farm—Right to take peats from another part of estate—Sale of farm and of peat moss to different persons—Rent—Abatement—Act 1449, cap. 18.

4. In 1880 the tenant of a farm renewed his lease of the farm "all as possessed by him." For many years he and his predecessors in the farm had been in use to take peats from a moss on another part of the landlord's estate, a particular lair being appropriated to the farm. Certain estate regulations were incorporated in the lease, under which, inter alia, the landlord reserved to himself "all the mosses on the estate, with power to regulate and divide them as circumstances may render necessary, . . . And in the event of the proprietor letting the mosses for cultivation, it is hereby specially conditioned and declared that he shall be under no obligation to find moss for the tenants in place thereof. The tenant continued under the new lease to take peats from the moss, until 1887, when the proprietor sold the moss. The proprietor having subsequently sold the farm, held in a question between the tenant and the purchaser of the farm that the tenant had under his lease a right to take peats from the moss, and that he was entitled to an abatement from his rent corresponding to the value of the right to take peats of which he had been deprived.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that the tenant's right to take peats from the moss was not protected by the Act 1449, cap. 18, so as to be good against singular successors in the ownership of the peat moss. Duncan v. Brooks, May 17, 1894, p. 760.

Subject—Lease of mines and minerals—Right to occupy houses.

5. The proprietor of a mineral field, and of the surface of certain detached pieces of ground on which were built workmen's houses, stores, &c., let the minerals for a period of thirty-one years with the usual rights to work the same, and with right also to the tenant "to use and occupy," during the currency of the lease, the houses, &c., the tenant paying and so relieving the landlord of all feu-duties and taxes payable in respect of the houses, and also undertaking to keep in repair and insure the same; "for which causes and on the other part," the tenant bound himself to pay a fixed rent, or, in the option of the landlord, specified lordships. In a competition between the proprietor's representative in the mineral field and his general testamentary trustees, held that the whole of the fixed rent or lordships was payable in respect of the right to work the minerals, the occupation of the houses being a separate right, the consideration for which was the payment of the feu-duties, &c. Dixon's Trustees v. Church's Trustees, Jan. 30, 1894, p. 441.

Trade fixtures—Right in security.

6. Trade fixtures attached by a tenant to the solum become the property of the landlord subject to the tenant's right to remove them.

A tenant assigned to his landlord certain trade fixtures on the subjects let, in security of advances. In a question between the landlord and the tenant's creditors, held that the fixtures being partes soli were the property of the landlord, and that the tenant's assignation operated as a valid renunciation of his right to remove them so long as the debt was not paid. Miller v. Muirhead, March 10, 1894, p. 658.

Tenant's right to remove buildings erected by him.

7. Where a tenant is entitled at the expiration of his lease to remove buildings erected by him, he cannot enforce this right when he has not implemented his obligations under the lease. Smith v. Harrison & Company's Trustee, Dec. 22, 1893, p. 330.

Value of buildings erected by tenant—Trust-deed for creditors—Compensation.

8. A tenant, several years before the termination of his lease, granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors. The lease having been abandoned by the trustee, it was arranged between the trustee and the landlord that buildings which the tenant would have been entitled to remove at the natural expiration of the lease should be taken over by the landlord at their value. Held that the landlord's agreement to pay the value of the buildings was to be construed as subject to his antecedent right to retain them till the tenant had implemented his obligations under the lease, and that the landlord was entitled to set off against the trustee's claim for the value of the buildings his loss by the tenant's abandonment of the lease. Smith v. Harrison & Company's Trustee, Dec. 22, 1893, p. 330.

Fixtures—Paper-mill—Steam-engines—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854, sec. 42.

9. The steam-power of a paper mill in the hands of the proprietor was supplied by a number of engines of different sizes, which were fixed by bolts and nuts to solid foundations of masonry, specially designed for their reception.

LEASE—Continued.

Although they could be removed without injury to themselves or to the buildings, the foundations would have required alteration to adapt them to engines of any other shape or size. Held that the engines were heritable fixtures in the sense of the Act of 1854, and fell to be valued as part of the lands and heritages.

Observed that the rules which regulate the rights of landlord and tenant in regard to machinery erected by the tenant during the currency of his lease had no application; and that the principles to be applied were practically those which regulate the rights of heir and executor. Cowan & Sons, Limited, v. Assessor for Midlothian, May 25, 1894, p. 812.

Rent—Rent legally due prior to heir's succession, but conventionally payable thereafter—Title to sue.

10. Where a tenant is bound to pay rent at a certain term, the landlord then in possession is entitled to enforce the obligation notwithstanding that he may be liable to account for the rent recovered to the representatives of his predecessor. Lennox v. Reid, Nov. 14, 1893, p. 77.

Compensation for improvements—Notice—Determination of tenancy—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, sec. 7.

11. The lease of a farm was granted for nineteen years from the tenant's "entry, which is hereby declared to be to the houses, grass, and fallow land" at Whitsunday, "to the arable land in corn crop at the separation of the crop from the ground, and to the barns, barn-yard, and two cot-houses at Whitsunday following." After removing from the houses and grass the tenant, four months before Martinmas, gave notice to the landlord of his intention to claim compensation. Held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that the notice given by the tenant was sufficient under the above Act. Black v. Clay, June 22, 1894, H. L., p. 72.

Claim by landlord for damages—Lease of shootings—Excessive stock of game.

12. A lease of shootings gave the tenant the exclusive right to the game, including hares and rabbits, and bound the tenant to relieve the landlord of all claims which might be made by any of the agricultural tenants on account of damage sustained from the game, including hares and rabbits. In an action by the landlord against the shooting tenant for damage alleged to have been caused to the estate by the tenant permitting an excessive and unreasonable stock of rabbits to remain upon it, the pursuer did not allege that any claims had been made against him by the agricultural tenants. Held that the action was not relevant. Elliott's Trustees v. Elliott, June 7, 1894, p. 858.

Claim by landlord for damages—Mora.

13. Where, in the course of a lease for a term of years, a landlord considers that he is entitled to damages from his tenant, and where the tenant might be prejudiced in his defence through the loss of evidence, the landlord is bound, without delay, to give notice to his tenant of his claim, and of his intention to enforce it, otherwise he will be barred from doing so. Elliott's Trustees v. Elliott, June 7, 1894, p. 858.

Claim by tenant for damages—Mora.

14. The tenant of a farm, three years after the farm had been sold, brought an action against his former landlord, averring that on each occasion during a period of seven years on which he had paid his rent, and at various other times, orally and in writing, he had protested against and complained of the landlord's failure to implement conditions of the lease under which the landlord was bound to burn a certain proportion of the heather annually, and to keep the fences of the farm in repair, and concluding for damages for the alleged breach of these conditions. Held that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant, as they shewed that he had paid his rent during the seven years without reservation of a specific claim for damages. Emalie v. Young's Trustees, March 16, 1894, p. 710.
15. In an action of damages at the instance of a tenant against his landlord on the ground that from 1887 to 1892 he had not had the use of the granary and piggery on the farm, the pursuer averred that in the former year those buildings became "unfit to be repaired" "on account of decay occasioned by the lapse of time," that at the rent collection in the summer of that year, and at every succeeding rent collection, he had asked the factor to put them into tenantable order, and that the factor had frequently promised to have this done, but had never fulfilled his promise. He had not, however, made or claimed any deduction from his rent. Held (1) that the tenant had a relevant action of damages, in respect that the landlord was liable for extraordinary repairs necessitated by natural decay; and (2) that the tenant was not barred by delay from insisting on his claim. Johnstone v. Hughan, May 22, 1894, p. 777.

Trespass by landlord—Reparation—Personal injury—Horse frightened by manure piled on farm near end of lease.

16. In an action of damages for personal injury the pursuer averred that the defender was the proprietor of a farm of which the pursuer was tenant, and from which he was to remove at Whitsunday; that before the term of removal the defender entered on a field on the farm and placed thereon a heap of bags of manure covered with a tarpaulin, which flapped in the wind; that on 12th May the pursuer's horse shied at the manure bags, whereby the pursuer was seriously injured; and that the defender in placing the bags where he did was a trespasser on ground in the pursuer's occupation. Held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue whether the defender wrongfully placed the bags of manure upon a field in the occupation of the pursuer, and whether the pursuer was injured by his horse taking fright thereat. Gibson v. Stewart, Jan. 30, 1894, p. 437.

Crofter—Nature of right in holding—March fence—Crofters Holdings Act, 1886—Act 1661, c. 41.

17. Held that a crofter within the meaning of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, is the tenant, not the proprietor, of his holding, and that, therefore, he has no title to insist, under the Act 1661, c. 41, upon the proprietor of lands adjoining his croft paying half the cost of the march fence. MacDonald v. Dalgleish, June 12, 1894, p. 900.

Crofter—Succession—Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, sec. 16.

MARRIAGE-CONTRACT. Antenuptial bond of annuity—Whether provision for wife or wife trustee for husband.

1. By antenuptial bond of annuity A provided to his wife an annuity of £1000 per annum, "to be applied by her towards the expenses of my household and establishment, and that during all the days of my life, . . . moreover, I do hereby renounce and discharge my jus mariti and right of administration of and in relation to" his wife's estate, "including the foresaid annuity payable to her during my lifetime, declaring that the same shall be and remain a separate estate in her person, free of any right or claim on my part whatsoever." Some years after the marriage A executed a trust-disposition of his whole estate for behoof of creditors. Held that the annuity fell to be applied by the wife for her husband's behoof, and that therefore the bond was ineffectual in a question with his creditors. Elliott v. Elliott's Trustee, July 7, 1894, p. 955.

Jus mariti—Exclusion of.

2. By antenuptial marriage-contract executed in 1855 a wife conveyed the whole funds payable to her under her father's settlement to trustees for the purpose, inter alia, that the revenue of £5000 (being the portion of the funds available at the date of the contract) should be paid to herself exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of her husband, the clear revenue of the remainder to be held for the joint behoof of the spouses and paid to them on their joint receipt. The husband expressly renounced his jus mariti and right of administration, in so far as the capital of the whole funds and the revenue of the £5000 were concerned, but the deed was silent as to the husband's rights with respect to the revenue of the remainder of the funds. Held that the husband's jus mariti and right of administration did not affect funds conveyed to the trustees by the antenuptial contract of marriage or the revenue thereof. Bruce's Trustees v. Bruce's Trustee, Feb. 27, 1894, p. 593.

Jus relictæ—Married Women's Property Act, 1881, secs. 6 and 8.

3. Provisions of an antenuptial contract of marriage, dated in 1874, which were held to be inconsistent with a claim by the surviving husband to one-half of his wife's moveable property jure relictæ. Buntine v. Buntine's Trustees, March 16, 1894, p. 714.

Income to be held for joint behoof and paid on joint receipt of spouses—Spouses living separate—Husband's sequestration.

4. An antenuptial marriage-contract contained a direction that a certain fund was to be held by trustees "for the joint behoof of the spouses, and paid to them on their joint receipt." Under an arrangement between the husband and wife, the trustees for some time paid over one-half of the income to each, but the husband's estate having been sequestered, they refused to make any payments except on the joint receipt of the wife and the husband or his trustee. Held that the wife and the husband's trustee were entitled each to receive payment of one-half. Bruce's Trustees v. Bruce's Trustee, Feb. 27, 1894, p. 593.

Conveyance to marriage-contract trustees retenta possessione—Sale—Delivery.

5. In December 1883 M's estates were sequestered, but before a trustee had been appointed a deed of arrangement was executed between M and his creditors and B. By this deed M assigned his furniture to B in consideration of payment of a sum exceeding its value by way of composition to the creditors. B thereafter assigned the furniture to the trustees under M's antenuptial marriage-contract for behoof of M's wife in liferent, and of the children of the marriage in fee, M's jus mariti being excluded. The furniture was allowed to remain in the house then occupied by M and his wife, which belonged to the trustees, and on the spouses removing to another house in 1884 the furniture was taken with them. In 1890 M sold the furniture to G, and G let the furniture on hire to M. The furniture remained with M and his wife. In an action by the marriage-contract trustees to have G interdicted from removing the furniture, held that the right to the furniture was in the trustees, in respect that since the date of the assignation in their favour M's wife had been in actual possession of it as liferentrix, and that the trustees had accordingly been in civil possession through her, and that G therefore had no title to it, and interdict granted. Mitchell's Trustees v. Gladstone, Feb. 27, 1894, p. 586.

7. Bishop*, March 17, 1894, p. 728.

Alimentary liferent—Whether revocable.

8. Terms of a will left by a husband upon the construction of which it was held that it was not his intention to leave his widow his entire estate absolutely, and discharged of an alimentary liferent constituted in her favour by their marriage-contract.

Question whether it is in the power of a husband, with the consent of his wife, to revoke an alimentary liferent in her favour constituted by marriage-contract. Elliott's Trustees v. Elliott, July 13, 1894, p. 975.

MASTER AND SERVANT. Contract—Notice—Reparation—Insurance—Employers Liability Act, 1880.

1. In defence to an action by a workman against his employers for damages for personal injury, at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, the defenders proved that they had posted at various places in their works, including the pay-box, notices to the effect that from the weekly wages paid to the workmen certain sums would be deducted, to secure certain insurance benefits in case of accident, and that any workman accepting such benefits would be held to have discharged all claims against his employers. It was further proved that the notice was well known to the defenders' workmen generally, and that the pursuer had taken benefit of the insurance. The Court assolized the defenders, holding (1) that the conditions founded on were lawful conditions of the contract of employment; and (2) that on the evidence the pursuer must be held to have known of and assented to the conditions. Wright v. Howard, Baker, & Co., Oct. 26, 1893, p. 25.

Assignment of contract of service by master—Newspaper.

2. In 1888 M'Farlane, the proprietor of a daily newspaper, appointed Ross to be manager of the paper by letter as follows:—"I hereby accept your offer to serve me as general manager of" the paper "for two years." In 1890 the engagement was renewed by letter, addressed to Ross and signed by both parties, in these terms,—“We have to-day arranged your reappointment as general manager of” the paper for five years. In 1892 M'Farlane sold the paper to Martin, the contracts with the newspaper staff being assigned to Martin, who undertook to relieve M'Farlane of his future liabilities thereunder. Martin offered to employ Ross as manager on the same terms as before, but Ross being afraid that by accepting this offer he might liberate M'Farlane from his liability under the former contract, declined to accept it without M'Farlane's written consent. In reply to Ross' application for this, M'Farlane wrote,—“You are at liberty to make any bargain you like with Martin without my consent.” M'Farlane withheld his written consent until after Martin had withdrawn his offer and had declined to take Ross as manager. In an action of damages for breach of contract by Ross against M'Farlane, the defender pleaded that the pursuer having been offered employment on the same terms with Martin, was entitled to nominal damages only. Held that the pursuer was entitled to substantial damages, per the Lord Justice-Clerk, on the ground that the defender being in breach of his contract with the pursuer, and not having given the written consent required by the pursuer, was not entitled to plead the offer of employment with Martin in mitigation of damages; per Lord Rutherford Clark and Lord Trayner, on the ground that whether the defender was in breach of contract or not, he was bound to have given the pursuer the consent required; dis. Lord Young, on the ground that there had been no breach of contract by the defender. Opinions (per Lord Rutherford Clark and Lord Trayner) that the defender by assigning the business to Martin, and so disabling himself from fulfilling the contract with the pursuer, had committed a breach of contract. Ross v. M'Farlane, Jan. 19, 1894, p. 396.

MINES AND MINERALS. Railway—Freestone—Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 70.

1. Held that the exception of "mines of coal, ironstone, slate, and other minerals," in the 70th section of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, from conveyances of land to railway companies covers freestone. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. v. Bain, Nov. 15, 1893, p. 134.

Railway—Notice—Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 71.

2. A quarry-master having given notice to a railway company, under the 71st section of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, that he intended to work certain freestone belonging to him under the company's line, the company brought a note of suspension and interdict, averring, inter alia, that in the ordinary course of working the quarry the freestone in question would not be worked for many years, and that the notice had not been bona fide given, but was merely intended to raise up a fictitious claim against the company. Held that these averments were relevant, and a proof allowed. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. v. Bain, Nov. 15, 1893, p. 134.

Lease—Construction—Right to occupy houses.

3. The proprietor of a mineral field, and of the surface of certain detached pieces of ground on which were built workmen's houses, stores, &c., let the minerals for a period of thirty-one years with the usual rights to work the same, and with right also to the tenant "to use and occupy," during the currency of the lease, the houses, &c., the tenant paying and so relieving the landlord of all feu-duties and taxes payable in respect of the houses, and also undertaking to keep in repair and insure the same; "for which causes and on the other part," the tenant bound himself to pay a fixed rent, or, in the option of the landlord, specified lordships. In a competition between the proprietor's representative in the mineral field and his general testamentary trustees, held that the whole of the fixed rent or lordships was payable in respect of the right to work the minerals, the occupation of the houses being a separate right, the consideration for which was the payment of the feu-duties, &c. Dixon's Trustees v. Church's Trustees, Jan. 30, 1894, p. 441.

Church—Lands held in trust for use and benefit of minister.

4. In 1676 certain lands were conveyed in trust "for the use and benefit of the minister of the gospel serving the cure at the Kirk of Bo'ness." In 1888 minerals in the lands were opened and leased for twenty years at a yearly rent of £25 or royalties. In a special case between the trustees and the minister of the parish, held that the mineral rents or royalties were not to be paid to the minister as part of the income of the benefice, but were to be accumulated as capital, the income of the accumulated fund only being paid to the minister for the time. Galbraith v. Minister of Bo'ness, Oct. 27, 1893, p. 30.

Wages of miners—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887.

5. In 1871 a mine owner entered into an agreement with his miners by which the parties agreed that an average uniform deduction of 56 lbs. should be made from the gross contents of each hutch sent up from the pit in respect of stones and substances in the hutch other than coal. In an appeal by the manager against a conviction of a contravention of sec. 12 of the above Act, the Court quashed the conviction, holding that the agreement was lawful, and that deductions made in terms thereof did not infer a contravention of the Act in cases where the miner was paid on a smaller amount of coal than he had actually sent up. Ronaldson v. Mowat, July 13, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 55.

6. A coalowner entered into an agreement with his miners by which no payment should be made for the excess weight of any hutch beyond 10 cwt., and the practice was when a hutch was found to contain more than 10 cwt. to carry the weighing of it no further. In an appeal by the manager against a conviction of offences against sec. 12 and sec. 13, subsec. 1, of the above Act, held (1) that the conviction of the first offence was bad, in respect that the agreement for deductions was valid, overfilling being "improper filling" in the sense of the Act, and that the failure to weigh or pay for the contents of the hutches beyond the maximum of 10 cwts. was not a contravention of sec. 12; (2) and that the conviction of the second offence was bad, the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Wellwood holding that the checkweigher's duty to see that the agreement as to deductions was properly carried out did not require him to ascertain the exact weight of hutches weighing over 10 cwt., Lord Adam holding that the second charge was not relevant, as the accused was not bound to weigh the coal in the hutches separately from the other contents thereof. Atkinson v. Hastie, July 13, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 62.

MINOR AND PUPIL. Custody—Orphans—Minor's choice of residence and of religion—Brother's right to custody—Father's religion—Curator ad litem—Charity.

1. Two orphan children, a brother and sister, twelve years of age, were placed by their brother, thirty years of age, in a charitable institution not Roman Catholic. Shortly afterwards he presented a petition to the Court to have them restored to his custody, averring that they were not being brought up in the Roman Catholic faith, which he alleged to be that of their father, and that the children themselves wished to be removed. He also averred that he had arranged for their being suitably brought up in a Roman Catholic institution, and that he was "willing, should the Court require it, to retain them under his own care or under the care of a relative." Answers were lodged for the manager of the institution. The Court, in order to ascertain the actual facts in the interest of the children, before answer, appointed a curator ad litem. Thereafter the Court being satisfied, on a statement made by the curator ad litem in a minute, that the children were well provided for in the institution, that the girl, a minor pube, was desirous of remaining where she was, that both children were averse to being separated, and that the father's conduct shewed that he wished them to be brought up as Protestants, refused the petition. Morrison v. Quarrier, June 9, 1894, p. 889, and July 19, 1894, p. 1071.

Custody of child—Contempt of Court—Disobedience of order to bring child within jurisdiction—Sequestration.

2. A father presented a petition for the custody of his pupil child and obtained decree against an aunt of the child ordaining her to deliver the child to him. The aunt not having done so, the Court ordered her to attend personally at the bar, and on her failure to obey this order sequestered her estates, and appointed a judicial factor thereon. Thereafter the aunt presented a petition for the recall of the sequestration and the factory. She explained that she had not received service of the order to attend, and that her health made it dangerous for her to attend, and by her counsel she submitted herself unreservedly to the judgment of the Court. The father lodged answers, in which he submitted that the petition ought not to be granted until the aunt had handed over the child to him. It appeared that the child, who had now attained twelve years of age, had resided with the aunt for eight years, and had a decided wish to remain with her. The Court, without requiring the aunt's personal presence, and without requiring her to deliver up the child, granted her petition. Edgar v. Fisher's Trustees, Nov. 10, 1893, p. 59, and Fisher v. Edgar, July 20, 1894, p. 1076.

PARENT AND CHILD. Aliment—Voluntary separation of parents.

1. Under a voluntary deed of separation and aliment, dated in August 1891, a wife was entitled to the income of £1000 vested by the husband in trustees. In October 1891 the wife gave birth to a daughter, and in May 1893 an action was raised in name of the daughter, with her mother's concurrence, against the father for aliment. In this action the pursuer alleged that no provision had been made for her aliment, and that her father was possessed of between £2000 and £3000. Held (1) that the action was to be regarded as an application by the mother for additional aliment; (2) that the agreement made in August 1891 must be held to have been made in contemplation of the birth of the child; and (3) that no relevant ground had been stated for giving additional aliment. Scott v. Scott, June 6, 1894, p. 853.

Custody—Bill-Chamber—Jurisdiction.

2. Held by Lord Kinnear that a petition by a father for the custody of his child was competently presented in vacation to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, and order for delivery granted. Edgar v. Fisher's Trustees, Nov. 10, 1893, p. 59.

Custody—Contempt of Court—Judicial Factor.

3. A father presented a petition for the custody of his pupil child and obtained decree against an aunt of the child ordaining her to deliver the child to him. The aunt not having done so, the Court ordered her to attend personally at the bar, and on her failure to obey this order sequestrated her estates and appointed a judicial factor thereon. Thereafter the aunt presented a petition for the recall of the sequestration and the factory. She explained that she had not received service of the order to attend, and that her health made it dangerous for her to attend, and by her counsel she submitted herself unreservedly to the judgment of the Court. The father lodged answers, in which he submitted that the petition ought not to be granted until the aunt had handed over the child to him. It appeared that the child, who had now attained twelve years of age, had resided with the aunt for eight years, and had a decided wish to remain with her. Custody—Cruelty to Wife—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, sec. 5.

4. A married woman commenced a suit in the English Courts for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty. The husband objected to the jurisdiction on the ground that his domicile was in Scotland. The husband subsequently presented a petition to the Court of Session for the custody of the children against his wife, who had removed them from his custody under pretence of taking them on a visit to her father. The wife, in answer, averred that on some occasions the petitioner had treated the children with cruelty, and further made specific statements of cruelty to herself. The Court granted the prayer of the petition. In an appeal the House, holding that the wife's averments of cruelty to herself were relevant in answer to the husband's petition for the custody of his children, and considering it expedient that the inquiry into the husband's conduct should be made in the wife's proceedings for judicial separation, in which the question as to the custody of the children might also be determined, recalled the interlocutor of the First Division, on the wife undertaking to abandon the proceedings in England, and to raise and duly prosecute an action of separation in Scotland, and directed the Court to sist the husband's petition in hoc statu.

Held further that having regard to the interests of the children, the eldest of whom was not more than eight years of age, the interim custody should remain with the mother. Stevenson v. Stevenson, June 5, 1894, H. L., p. 96.

Custody—Appeal—Execution pending appeal—Prayer for further order.

5. A wife having presented an appeal to the House of Lords against a judgment of the Court ordaining her to deliver up the children of the marriage to their father, the husband presented a petition craving the Court "to allow execution to proceed upon the said judgment notwithstanding the appeal," and also "to grant warrant to messengers-at-arms and other officers of the law to take into their custody the persons of the said children, wherever they may be found, and deliver them into the custody of the petitioner." The Court granted the prayer for execution pending appeal, there being no reason to believe that the interests of the children would be prejudiced thereby, but quoad ultra refused the prayer of the petition as incompetent. Stevenson v. Stevenson, March 7, 1894, p. 617.

Custody—Repayment of costs of upbringing of child—Custody of Children Act, 1891, sec. 2.

6. In a petition by a father for the custody of his daughter, six years of age, the respondent, the child's maternal grandfather, stated that he had brought up the child from its birth, and that he was willing to deliver up the child on payment of £85, which he had expended on its aliment. In pronouncing an order for delivery of the child the Court, considering that the petitioner was in humble circumstances, and that the respondent had failed to shew that a larger sum was reasonable, ordained the petitioner to pay to the respondent £15, in monthly payments of 5s. Soutar v. Carrie, July 19, 1894, p. 1050.

Religious training of child.

7. Opinions that the wishes of a deceased father with reference to the religious training of his children, though entitled to weight, are not conclusive on the subject, the paramount consideration being the interests of the children themselves. Morrison v. Quarrier, July 19, 1894, p. 1071.

Expenses—Parent suing as tutor and administrator for pupil child.

PARTNERSHIP. Power of one partner to bind firm—Lease.

1. Where one only of two joint adventurers signed a lease for a period of years of premises in which to carry on the business of the joint adventure, and, upon the termination of the joint adventure at the end of the first year of the lease, the other joint adventurer was sued for the amount of the rent for that year, held, after a proof, that the defender was liable in the sum sued for, but question, whether he was liable as tenant under the lease. Cooke's Circus Buildings Company, Limited, v. Welding, Jan. 11, 1894, p. 339.

Jurisdiction—Reconvention—Foreign.

2. An English firm raised an action in Scotland against a Scotsman, but before final judgment the firm was dissolved, one of the partners continuing the business under the original firm name. No notice of the dissolution was given to the defender of the action, and ex facie of the proceedings the firm continued to litigate to the end. The defender thereafter raised an action in Scotland against the firm by its firm name, pleading that jurisdiction existed ex reconventione. Held that jurisdiction ex reconventione existed notwithstanding the dissolution of the firm. Allan v. Wormser Harris & Company, June 8, 1894, p. 866.

1. The specification for a patent claimed "in oil-spray lighting and heating apparatus working with self-generating steam the method of creating a pressure in the water-tank by admitting steam from the self-generating coil or chamber to the said tank." In an action by the patentee for interdict against the infringement of the patent, the Court assolized the defenders on the ground that the patent had been anticipated by a self-generating oil-vapour lamp in which the back pressure caused by the generation of the oil vapour in a self-generating chamber was neutralised by admitting oil vapour from the chamber to the oil-tank substantially in the same way as the steam was admitted to the water-tank of the pursuer's apparatus. *Rose's Patents Co., Limited, v. PENALTY. Summary procedure—Competency of civil action for interdict where statute provides a penalty on summary conviction—Patent.

The Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888, sec. 1, by subsec. 1 enacts that a person should not be entitled to describe himself as a patent-agent unless he is registered, and by subsec. 4 enacts that if any person knowingly describes himself as a patent-agent in contravention of this section, he shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £20. An action for declarator that the defender was not entitled to describe himself as a patent-agent so long as he was not registered, and for interdict against him so describing himself, dismissed as incompetent on the ground that the statute in making the use of the designation patent-agent by a person not registered a criminal offence, and subjecting the person so using it to a penalty, did not confer any civil right upon other persons to prevent him

1. An action by the Police Commissioners of a burgh against a ratepayer of the burgh for recovery of a private improvement assessment imposed by them was dismissed on the ground that the ratepayer had not received notice of the imposition of the assessment at least two weeks before the day fixed for the hearing of appeals, as required by section 106 of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862. The Commissioners then raised an action against their collector for payment of the amount of the assessment, averring that their failure to recover the assessment had occurred through his neglect to send the notice within the statutory time. The Court dismissed the action, holding that the pursuers had not proved loss through the defender's fault, in respect that it had not been determined whether the sum sued for might not still be recovered from the ratepayer by re-imposing the assessment and giving him timeous notice under the statute. Glasgow Police Commissioners v. Donald, June 12, 1894, p. 895.

Assessment—Special sewer-rate—Ultra vires—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, secs. 75 and 96 to 100.

2. In an action by police commissioners against a ratepayer for payment of the amount of a special sewer-rate for 1891-92, the defender pleaded that the rate was ultra vires because unnecessary, in respect that if the commissioners had not in previous years debited the special sewer-fund with certain expenditure which was not a proper charge against the special fund, and had credited that fund with certain income which had been improperly paid into the general burgh funds, the commissioners would have raised enough money during the previous years, in name of special sewer-rate, to satisfy the purposes for which the assessment had been imposed. Held that this plea was not relevant as a defence to an action for payment of the rate. Hamilton Police Commissioners v. Finlay, Nov. 8, 1893, p. 54.

Assessment—Gas—Burgh Gas Supply (Scotland) Act, 1876, secs. 38 and 41.

3. Held that gas commissioners are entitled (1) in fixing the price of gas to consider whether a higher or lower rate of charge will yield the greater return, and to adopt such rate as in their judgment will yield the greatest return from gas consumers, if that is necessary to prevent a deficit, and (2) at the same time to impose a guarantee rate to meet an anticipated deficit on the gas account. Milne v. Commissioners of Lockerbie, July 4, 1894, p. 940.

Assessment—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889.

4. Held that under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, a county council is entitled to levy the county general assessment on the annual value of lands and heritages in parliamentary burghs within the county, which have less than 7000 inhabitants and have no police establishment. Police Commissioners of Oban v. County Council of Argyllshire, March 9, 1894, p. 644.

Street—Regular line of street—Setting back buildings—General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, sec. 162.

5. In 1877 the corporation of a burgh resolved to widen a street in the burgh to an uniform width of 40 feet. In 1893 the width of the street, with the exception of one place in which three houses projected 13 to 15 feet into the street, was at least 40 feet, but the buildings were not in any regular line, some being further back from the 40 feet line than others. One of the three houses which projected beyond that line having been pulled down with a view to its being rebuilt, the Magistrates sought to have the proprietor ordained to set the new building back to "the regular line of the street," in terms of sec. 162 of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862. Held that the "regular line of the street" contemplated by the Act was the line of the existing buildings in the street, and that there was, in point of fact, no such regular line to which the Magistrates were entitled to have the new building set back. Magistrates of Galashiels v. Schulze, March 16, 1894, p. 682.

Street—Restriction on height of building—General Turnpike Act, 1831—Adoption of Act by Local Act.

6. Held that sec. 91 of the above Act applied to a street in the burgh, and that the Magistrates were entitled to prevent the proprietor of vacant land bordering on a street from erecting thereon buildings of a greater height than 7 feet within 25 feet of the centre of the street. Magistrates of Galashiels v. Schulze, March 16, 1894, p. 682.

Street—Height of houses—Dean of Guild—Edinburgh Municipal and Police (Amendment) Act, 1891, sec. 44.

7. Held that the above enactment applied to houses which it was proposed to erect on ground hitherto unbuilt on fronting an existing street. Hogg v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, July 7, 1894, p. 958.

Street—"New street"—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, secs. 152 and 153.

8. A street in a burgh which had been formed several years prior to the above Act had buildings on the south side only, the street being bounded on the north by the back gardens and by a piece of ground belonging to A at the west end of the street. Held that A by building on his ground would not form a new street, or part thereof, in the sense of the Act. Stewart v. Marshall, July 20, 1894, p. 1117.

Street—Property—Disposition—Obligation on disponent to maintain road—Conversion of road into a city street.

9. By disposition, dated in 1875, of a piece of ground in the burgh of Maryhill, near Glasgow, A, the disponent, became bound to construct a road and footpath through other lands belonging to him as an access to the ground disposed, and B, the disponent, became bound to pay a certain proportion "of the expense of maintaining the said road." In 1891 the burgh of Maryhill was included in the extended boundaries of the city of Glasgow, and the Glasgow Master of Works called on A to repair the road by putting in new water-channels of square dressed whinstone four feet broad, and covering the road with hand-broken whinstone metal. A having called on B to pay his proportion of the expense of such repair, and B having repudiated liability, A brought an action against B for declarator that the defender was bound to pay a proportion of the expense of the operations required by the Master of Works. B pleaded that as these operations were not of the character contemplated by the disposition he was not liable. A proof shewed that the operations required by the Master of Works would greatly exceed in cost what would be necessary to restore the road to its original condition. Held that the pursuer was not entitled to decree of declarator as concluded for. Campbell's Trustees v. Scottish Union and National Insurance Co., Nov. 28, 1893, p. 167.

Street—Reparation—Regulation of traffic.

10. In order to ease the traffic passing up a steep street in Glasgow, there was laid down a stone track which led up on the right hand side of the street for a considerable distance, and then passed diagonally across it. At one point the track was only 18 inches from the pavement, between which and it there was a rough gutter 6 inches below the kerbstone of the pavement, and sloping gently upward to the track, which was about a foot above the gutter. The rule of the road was, according to these arrangements, reversed for traffic going up and down the street. A child of five years old while playing at the point referred to tripped in the gutter, and falling on to the track was run over by a cart and killed. The track had been for a long time in the same condition without accident. In an action of damages by the child's father against the Police Commissioners founded upon the position of the track and condition of the gutter, held that no fault was attributable to the defenders. Scott v. Glasgow Police Commissioners, Jan. 31, 1894, p. 466.

Street—Reparation.

11. Held that the proprietor of a house in a public street within burgh, whose titles include the solum of the pavement in front of the house, is not relieved from the duty of maintaining the pavement in a safe condition for foot-passengers by the mere fact that the street is under the control and management of a public body, and that he will be liable in damages to foot-passengers who are injured through his neglect to fulfil this duty. Baillie v. Shearer's Judicial Factor, Feb. 1, 1894, p. 498.

Street—Reparation—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, secs. 289, 317, 326.

12. Held that the owner of the solum of a pavement adjoining his house in a public street is liable in damages for an accident caused to a member of the public by the defective state of the pavement, unless the pavement had been taken over by the board of police in terms of sec. 326 of the above Act. Baillie v. Shearer's Judicial Factor, Feb. 1, 1894, p. 498.

Street—Causing obstruction in a public street—Greenock Police Act, 1877, sec. 179, subsec. 25.

13. Terms of a complaint charging four persons with having wilfully occasioned an obstruction and annoyance in a public street by standing, walking, and loitering therein, and procuring two other persons carrying boards with placards thereon to do the same, which was held relevant. M'Giveran v. Auld, July 20, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 69.

Special Water District—Ultra vires—Secretary for Scotland—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 81, subsec. 2.

14. Held that a determination of the Secretary for Scotland under the above section that a police burgh should be represented on the committee in the proportion of eight members to six members appointed by the County Council was ultra vires, and determination reduced. Eastern District Committee of Dumbartonshire County Council v. Police Commissioners of Clydebank, Oct. 19, 1893, p. 12.

Water-pipe—Public Road—Compulsory Powers—Ultra vires—Railway—Construction—Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847, secs. 28 and 29.

15. Public water commissioners had statutory authority to lay a line of water-pipes along a road which passed over two girder bridges belonging to a railway company. Held, upon a construction of secs. 28 and 29 of the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847 (rev. judgment of Lord Low), that it was ultra vires of the commissioners to carry the pipes through the stone abutments of the bridges and to sling them from the girders. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. v. Magistrates of Glasgow, July 17, 1894, p. 1033.

1. In an action at the instance of the Inspector of Poor of the parish of Gala-shiels, to which a part of the parish of Melrose had been transferred by the Boundary Commissioners, the Court decided that the original parish was still liable for the maintenance of a pauper who had, prior to the Commissioners' order, acquired a settlement in the transferred area. Thereafter the parties having failed to come to an agreement as to the adjustment of rates and liabilities necessitated by the transference, the Commissioners issued an award under section 50 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1889, by which they ordained the parish of Galashiels "to assume responsibility for and relieve" the parish of Melrose of advances made or to be made in respect of paupers who had prior to the transference acquired a settlement in the transferred area ; and on the other hand ordained the parish of Melrose to make certain annual payments to the parish of Galashiels. Held that the award was within the powers of the Commissioners, and was not inconsistent with the previous decision of the Court. Inspector of Galashiels v. Inspector of Melrose, Jan. 19, 1894, p. 391.

Property held for behoof of the poor—Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, sec. 52.

2. Funds which were held under the 52d section of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, to be vested in the parochial board. Kirk-Session of Pencaitland v. Inspector of Poor of Pencaitland, Dec. 7, 1893, p. 215.

Settlement—Rehabilitation—Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, sec. 76.

3. Held that a pauper who had been absent from a parish in which she had acquired a residential settlement for four years and a day before the commencement of a second period of chargeability, had lost her residential settlement there, notwithstanding the fact that during her absence she was for a time entitled to parochial relief, and obtained it from another parish. Inspector of Poor of Inverkip v. Inspector of Poor of Greenock, Nov. 14, 1893, p. 64.

Settlement—Imbecile pauper—Confinement in private lunatic asylum licensed by the Lunacy Board—Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1857, secs. 75 and 95—Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 7.

4. Held (1) that the Lunacy Act, 1857, fixes the permanent burden of a pauper lunatic's settlement in the parish of the lunatic's settlement at the date of seclusion in the district asylum, even in cases where the settlement is derivative ; and (2) that this liability is not avoided by reason of the lunatic being confined, with the sanction of the Lunacy Board, in a private asylum licensed by the board and not in the district asylum. Inspector of Cupar-Angus v. Inspector of Murroes, Feb. 23, 1894, p. 583.

PRESCRIPTION. Fishings—Trout-fishing—River navigable but non-tidal.

1. In a question between a riparian proprietor and a member of the public held (1) that a right in the public of being at or on the non-tidal portion of a river for the purposes of navigation does not entitle them to fish for trout therein, and (2) that such a right of fishing cannot be acquired by prescriptive use. Grant v. Henry, Jan. 12, 1894, p. 358.

Fishing—Salmon-fishing.

2. Opinion that a right of salmon-fishing was an estate in land in the sense of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, and that possession of salmon-fishings for twenty years was prescriptive possession. Ogston v. Stewart's Trustees, Dec. 13, 1893, p. 282.

PROCESS. Summons—Competency—Two pursuers claiming separate damages.

1. Held that it is competent for two persons alleging injury by one calumnious statement to claim damages in one action provided the damages due to each are separately concluded for. Mitchell v. Grierson, Jan. 13, 1894, p. 367.

Issue—Slander.

2. Where two persons claim damages for one calumnious statement each pursuer must take a separate issue. Mitchell v. Grierson, Jan. 13, 1894, p. 367.

PROCESS—Continued.

Action of damages for death of father at instance of widow and certain only of the children—Intimation to remaining children.

4. In an action at the instance of a widow and four children for damages on account of the death of their husband and father, the defenders lodged a minute in which they stated that since the record was closed they had ascertained that some of the children of the deceased had not been made parties to the action. The Court appointed intimation to be made "to the children of the deceased . . . other than those who are pursuers in the action, in order that they may crave themselves to be sisted in the action within eight days, if so advised." Smith v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., Limited, Nov. 25, 1893, p. 162.

Record—Amendment—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29.

5. An action concluded for declarator that the pursuer had a right of common property along with the defender in a loch and in the solum thereof and minerals thereunder. The pursuer moved for leave to amend the summons by substituting a conclusion for declarator that he had a right of common property along with the defender in the loch and the waters thereof, and an exclusive right of property in a specified portion of the solum of the loch and the minerals thereunder. Held that under section 29 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, the amendment was incompetent. Leny v. Magistrates of Dunfermline, March 20, 1894, p. 749.

Record—Dean of Guild.

6. In a petition in a Dean of Guild Court for a lining the burgh surveyor, who was called as a respondent, appeared in Court before the Dean of Guild and stated verbal objections to the granting of the petition, but without having lodged written answers. The Dean of Guild having refused the petition, and the petitioner having appealed, the Court intimated that the surveyor could not be heard unless he lodged written answers, and having, of consent of the petitioner, allowed the surveyor to put in objections, remitted the cause to the Dean of Guild to make up a record on the petition and answers. Stewart v. Marshall, July 20, 1894, p. 1117.

Reclaiming Note—Competency—Interlocutor ordering proof—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 28.

7. On 30th January a Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor allowing a proof. The Court rose for recess on 3d February and met again on 13th February. The pursuer boxed a reclaiming note against the interlocutor on 12th February, being the earliest day after 3d February on which it was possible to box, but he did not, as he might have done, lodge a reclaiming note with the Clerk of Court within the six days allowed for reclaiming. Held that the reclaiming note had not been presented within six days from its date, and was therefore incompetent. Mackenzie v. Lucas & Aird, Feb. 15, 1894, p. 544.

Reclaiming Note—Competency—Interlocutory judgment—Court of Session Act, 1868, secs. 27, 28, and 54.

8. In an action of accounting the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor closing the record and allowing a proof. Thereafter an interlocutor was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary making a remit to a man of skill to report on certain objections to the account lodged by the defenders. Held that this interlocutor was not an interlocutor pronounced under sec. 27 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, and could not be reclaimed against without leave of the Lord Ordinary. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann, June 28, 1894, p. 930.

Reclaiming Note—Competency—Expenses—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 53.

9. In an action for payment of legitim the Lord Ordinary on 22d June pronounced an interlocutor, which decerned against the defender for a certain sum in name of legitim, and found the pursuer entitled to expenses, "reserving till after taxation the question whether any, and if so what, modification should be allowed in respect of the ascertainment of the amount of the legitim fund ; allows an account," &c. No reclaiming note was presented against this interlocutor. On 14th July the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Approves of the Auditor's report on the pursuer's account of expenses, and having heard counsel on the question of modification modifies the same to the extent of . . . Decerns against the defender for payment to the pursuer" of the balance of the taxed amount. The defender having presented a reclaiming note against this interlocutor within twenty-one days, and the pursuer having objected to the competency of the reclaiming note, on the ground that the interlocutor of 22d June was the final interlocutor in the cause, and that of 14th July merely executorial, held by the Second Division, after consultation with the Judges of the First Division, that the reclaiming note was competent, and that it brought up all previous interlocutors. Crallin's Trustees v. Muirhead's Judicial Factor, Oct. 21, 1893, p. 21.

Reclaiming Note—Competency—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 52.

10. Held that it is incompetent to reclaim against an interlocutor, pronounced on the claimer's motion, with a view to submitting a prior interlocutor to review. Watson v. Russell, Jan. 30, 1894, p. 433.

Reclaiming Note—Title to reclaim—Concurring pursuer.

11. Held that a person who is a party to a cause only to the extent of giving his consent and concurrence thereto has no title to present a reclaiming note against an interlocutor pronounced in the cause. Martin v. Lindsay, May 16, 1894, p. 759.

Expenses—Time of lodging objections to the Auditor's report—A. S., Feb. 6, 1806.

12. Held that, as a general rule, objections must be lodged within forty-eight hours, and that the forty-eight hours run from the date of the Auditor's issuing his report, and not from the date when the report is lodged in process.

Circumstances in which objections were allowed to be lodged on the eighth day after the report was signed. A B v. C D, July 20, 1894, p. 1083.

Expenses—Taxation—A. S., July 15, 1876, General Regulation 5.

13. The defender of an action, who, besides denying the pursuer's averments on the merits, pleaded that the action was incompetent, did not reclaim against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary repelling the plea to competency and allowing a proof. The Lord Ordinary having heard the proof, gave judgment for the pursuer. At the hearing upon a reclaiming note against that judgment the defender insisted in his objection to the competency of the action, but admitted that his defences on the merits could not be entertained in the absence of a third party. The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, dismissed the action as incompetent, and found the defender entitled to expenses. The pursuer objected to the Auditor's report on the defender's account of expenses in respect that under the A. S., July 15, 1876, General Regulation 5, the Auditor ought to have taxed off the whole expenses of the proof. The Court repelled the objection, holding that the question raised was one which it was for the Court to decide when disposing of the motion for expenses, and not for the Auditor, and that the objection came too late, the Court having finally disposed of the motion for expenses. Welsh v. Russell, May 19, 1894, p. 769.

Joint Minute.

PROCESS—Continued.Diligence—Railway.

16. In an action of damages brought against a railway company by the representatives of a wayman in their employment who had been run over by an accident train, the pursuers applied for a diligence to recover a great variety of writings. The Court, without determining whether the pursuers might not be entitled to recover some of the writings on a more limited application, refused the diligence asked for. Silver v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co., Jan. 23, 1894, p. 416.

Proof or jury trial—"Special cause"—Evidence Act, 1866, sec. 4.

17. In an action of damages, held that the probability that only a trifling award of damages would be recovered was not a "special cause" which entitled the Court to refuse to send the case to a jury. Rhind v. Kemp & Co., Dec. 13, 1893, p. 275.

See also infra, 32, 33, 34.

Jury trial—Verdict—Reparation.

18. In an action by a widow for damages on account of the death of her husband, which had been caused by a large gate belonging to the defenders falling on him, the defence was that the gate had been nailed up by order of the defenders, they not intending that it should thereafter be used as a gate, and that it had been opened without their knowledge and consent. The presiding Judge told the jury that even if they found that the gate when used as a gate was unsafe, the defenders would not be liable for the accident, if it was proved that it had been shut up by order of the defenders, and had not thereafter been used as a gate with their knowledge and consent. The jury returned an unanimous verdict for the defenders, but added this rider, as noted by the presiding Judge, "while accepting unanimously the law as laid down by your Lordship, we do not think that a due measure of supervision and care over the gate in question had been exercised by" the defenders. The verdict having been entered for the defenders, the pursuer moved for a rule to shew cause why a new trial should not be granted. The Court refused the motion, holding that the rider was not inconsistent with the verdict. Burns v. Steel Co. of Scotland, Limited, Nov. 7, 1893, p. 39.

Arrestment and furthcoming—Arrestment of joint property of tenant and landlord for landlord's debt—Competency.

19. Under the lease of a quarry the plant was declared to be the joint property of the landlord and of the tenant, the landlord being bound to pay one-half of the value thereof to the tenant at the ish of the lease. Certain creditors of the landlord, before the lease ended, used arrestments in the hands of the tenant. Thereafter they raised an action of furthcoming against the arrestee and the landlord's trustee, in which they alleged that the plant in the quarries had been attached, and concluded that the Court should ordain the arrestee to pay the whole debt due by the landlord or such part thereof as was represented by money arrested in his hands due by him to the landlord, and to pronounce such other orders as to the Court might "seem necessary for satisfying the said claim of the pursuers." The Court being of opinion that the summons contained no conclusions under which the arrestments, even if competently laid on, could be made available, allowed the pursuers an opportunity of amending the same. The pursuers, thereupon, amended their summons to the effect of concluding that the Court should ordain that the arrested plant should be sold, and the price thereof, so far as was necessary for the satisfaction of their debt, paid to them, or otherwise should pronounce a like order, upon the pursuers paying to the arrestee half the value of the plant as the same might be ascertained in terms of the lease. The Court assolized the defenders, on the ground that the conclusions were untenable, and that the interest of the landlord in the plant had not been validly arrested. Lucas's Trustees v. Campbell and Scott, July 20, 1894, p. 1096.

20. The magistrates of a police burgh having intimated that they claimed, under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, to be the licensing authority for the sale of exciseable liquors within the burgh, a publican holding a licence for premises in the burgh, which had been granted by the county Justices, brought an action for declarator that the licensing jurisdiction within the burgh had not been transferred from the county Justices to the burgh magistrates, and for interdict against the magistrates acting as the licensing authority. Held that the pursuer had a title to sue. Tennent v. Magistrates of Partick, March 20, 1894, p. 735.

Multiplepinding—Double distress—Fund in medio.

21. Where there were competing claimants to one half of a trust-estate, the right to the other half not being in dispute, one of the claimants raised an action of multiplepinding in name of the trustee, bringing the whole estate into Court as the fund in medio. Held that the action was incompetent. Macnab v. Waddell, May 30, 1894, p. 827.

Multiplepinding—Expenses.

22. Observed that it was the invariable rule that the expenses of bringing an action of multiplepinding fell to be paid out of the fund in medio when the multiplepinding was competently brought. Hepburn's Trustee v. Rex, July 17, 1894, p. 1024.

Petition—Competency—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 35.

24. Shareholders of a company presented a petition under the 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862, for rectification of the register of the company by deletion therefrom of the names of certain shareholders, in respect that their shares had been illegally allotted to them as promotion money. The respondents lodged answers in which they denied the petitioners' allegations, stated facts and circumstances tending to shew that they had given good consideration for their shares, and pleaded that the petition was incompetent. The Court held that petition under the 35th section was an inappropriate and inconvenient way of dealing with the statements contained in the petition and answers, and sisted process in order to enable the petitioners to raise an action of reduction in ordinary form. Blaikie v. Coats, Nov. 21, 1893, p. 150.

Petition—Competency—Entail.

25. An heir of entail cannot by way of summary petition obtain the judgment of the Court on a question as to the extent to which the estate is burdened by a bond of annuity granted by a former heir to his widow. Carter-Campbell v. Lamont-Campbell, Feb. 27, 1894, p. 614.

Petition—Competency—Judicial Factor.

26. Petition for the appointment of a judicial factor dismissed in respect it was not clear what the rights of the petitioners under the deeds founded on by them were, and that the petition was an inappropriate process for determining their rights. Dowie v. Hagart, July 19, 1894, p. 1052.

Petition—Execution pending appeal—Prayer for further order.

27. It is incompetent in a petition for interim execution of a judgment pending an appeal to the House of Lords to add a prayer for any further or other order in the proceedings. Stevenson v. Stevenson, March 7, 1894, p. 617.

Petition—Custody of child—Bill-Chamber.

28. Held by Lord Kinnear that a petition by a father for the custody of his child was competently presented in vacation to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, and order for delivery granted. Edgar v. Fisher's Trustees, Nov. 10, 1893, p. 59.

the Court had no jurisdiction to award sequestration by reason of the existence of a liquidation in England of the debtor's estates was incompetent. Gibson v. Munro, June 5, 1894, p. 840.

Reduction—Reduction of interlocutor of Sheriff.

30. Reduction of an interlocutor of a Sheriff recalling an interlocutor of his substitute, and appointing the cause to be heard before himself, dismissed as incompetent. County Council of Roxburgh v. Dalrymple's Trustees, July 19, p. 1063.

Suspension—Caution—Bill of Exchange.

Appeal—Proof or jury trial—Judicature Act, 1825, sec. 40.

32. A steelmelter, who had been dismissed from his employment, brought an action in a Sheriff Court against his employers for £220, as the balance of the wages due to him on a yearly engagement, and £30 as the equivalent of a free house, alleging that he had been engaged at £5 a-week for a year, with a free house, and that he had been unjustifiably dismissed after eight weeks' service. The defenders averred that the engagement was a weekly one, and that the dismissal was justifiable. The pursuer having appealed for jury trial, the defenders moved that the case should be sent back to the Sheriff Court for a proof. The Court remitted the case to the Sheriff Court for a proof. Cunningham v. Ayrshire Foundry Co., Limited, Oct. 21, 1893, p. 19.
33. In an action in a Sheriff Court at the instance of a tenant of a farm against his landlord for £100 damages, on the ground that he had not had the use of certain buildings on the farm, which had become useless through decay, the Sheriff allowed a proof. The defender having appealed for jury trial, the pursuer moved the Court to remit the cause to the Sheriff on the ground that the sum at stake was trifling, and that the Sheriff was already acquainted with the case, as, in another action, he had already settled the question of the landlord's liability to repair the buildings. Held that the defender was entitled to have the case tried by jury, no special cause to the contrary having been shewn. Johnstone v. Hughan, May 22, 1894, p. 777.
34. In an action raised in the Sheriff Court by a parish minister against the heritors for manse rent in consequence of their failure to provide a habitable manse, the defenders appealed under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, 1825, and moved that the cause should be remitted to the Lord Ordinary on Teinds in respect there was already pending before him a cognate cause under the Ecclesiastical Buildings, &c. Act, 1868. The respondent moved that the cause should be remitted back to the Sheriff. The Court, in respect that neither party asked for jury trial, and that the question to be tried was peculiarly appropriate to a local tribunal, remitted to the Sheriff. Bain v. Heritors of Duthil, Feb. 13, 1894, p. 537.

Appeal—Competency—Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, sec. 16.

35. Question whether the decision of a Sheriff, finding that a person to whom a holding had been bequeathed was not one of the relatives to whom the deceased might legally bequeath his holding, was a final decision in the sense of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886. Mackenzie v. Cameron, Jan. 25, 1894, p. 427.

Appeal—Competency—Statutory declaration of finality—Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, secs. 3, 42, and 43.

36. Opinions that notwithstanding the finality clause of the above Act, an appeal from the decision of a Sheriff would be competent where the question was whether the County Council had acted ultra vires in declaring that a road should cease to be a highway. County Council of Roxburgh v. Dalrymple's Trustees, July 19, 1894, p. 1063.

Appeal—Competency—Arbitration—Nomination of arbiter—Glasgow District Subway Act, 1890, sec. 56.

37. Under a private Act of Parliament all differences arising with regard to the carrying out of certain operations in a city were to be referred to an arbiter mutually agreed on by the promoters of the Act and the Corporation, and "failing such agreement" to an arbiter appointed "by the Sheriff of the county of Lanark." The Corporation presented a petition to the Sheriff, praying him to appoint an arbiter, which he did by an interlocutor in the ordinary form. Held that in doing so he was not acting in his judicial capacity, and that, therefore, an appeal to the Court of Session was incompetent. Magistrates of Glasgow v. Glasgow District Subway Co., Nov. 8, 1893, p. 53.

Sheriff—Appeal—Competency—Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sections 60, 61, and 150.

38. The Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, section 61, provides that "if any difference arise respecting the kind" or number of the accommodation works which a railway company is bound to make, or respecting their maintenance, "the same shall be determined by the Sheriff or two Justices." Held that no appeal lies to the Court of Session against a determination of a Sheriff-substitute under this section. Main v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co., Dec. 19, 1893, p. 323.

Sheriff—Interlocutor—Findings in fact—Act of Sederunt, 15th February 1851.

39. An interlocutor of a Sheriff disposing of a case in which a proof had been led contained no findings in fact as required by the Act of Sederunt, 15th February 1851. The Court remitted to the Sheriff to recall the interlocutor, and pronounce one in the form prescribed by the Act of Sederunt. Mackay v. Mackenzie, June 12, 1894, p. 894.

PROOF. Onus—Ship—Bill of lading—Discrepancy between quantity stated in bill of lading and quantity delivered.

1. Where the quantity of goods delivered by a vessel at the port of discharge is less than that stated in the bill of lading the onus of proving that the quantity referred to in the bill of lading was not in fact shipped lies upon the owner of the vessel. Horsley v. J. & A. D. Grimond, Jan. 23, 1894, p. 410.

Onus.

2. A, a domestic servant, on the death of her mistress claimed certain pieces of furniture in the house as given to her by her mistress. In a reference made to an arbiter by A and by the judicial factor on the deceased's estate, the former produced a list of furniture in her mistress's handwriting in support of her claim. The arbiter having decided the case against A, the judicial factor refused to return to her the list of furniture. In an action brought by A in the Sheriff Court against the judicial factor for delivery of the writing the Sheriff assolized the defender.

In an appeal the Court affirmed the judgment, the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Trayner holding that the pursuer had not proved her right to the document, Lord Rutherford Clark holding that the defender had proved that the document was his property. Hallpenny v. Howden, July 4, 1894, p. 945.

Oral modification of written contract—Compromise of action by joint minute.

3. Held that it was incompetent to prove by parole evidence an alleged verbal agreement to vary the terms on which an action had been compromised in a joint minute signed by counsel. Hamilton & Baird v. Lewis, Nov. 15, 1893, p. 120.

Necessity for writing.

4. Parole proof of evidence given at a former trial is competent in criminal trials. M'Giveran v. Auld, July 20, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 69.

PROOF—Continued.Hearsay—Fugitive.

5. Of two persons charged with the crime of murder, one disappeared and was declared an outlaw. During the trial which proceeded against the other, the prosecutor stated that he had without success exhausted all possible resources for finding the fugitive, and he proposed to elicit from a witness who knew him a statement made by the fugitive to the witness shortly after the alleged murder. Held that the evidence was incompetent, in respect (1) that statements made in the panel's absence could not be evidence against him; and (2) that the failure to find a person did not make hearsay evidence as to statements made by him competent. H. M. Advocate v. Monson, Dec. 23, 1893, Just. Cases, p. 5.

Telephone.

6. Held that the evidence of a person who deposed that he had heard words through a telephone, and that he recognised the voice, was competent evidence as to the identity of the person speaking through the telephone. M'Giveran v. Auld, July 20, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 69.

PROPERTY. Superior and Vassal—Feu-charter—Construction—Servitude—Road.

1. In 1806 a proprietor feued to A a piece of ground bounded on the south by a road, and on the west by another feu granted to B. At the northern extremity of A's feu, 140 feet from the road, was a well, and his charter contained this clause,—“But reserving always to our said feuars and their tenants and servants free entry and issue to and from the said well by a road or passage of 6 feet wide and at least 8 feet high, to be left out upon the west end of the piece of ground hereby disposed.” B had built a house fronting the road, with its eastern gable resting upon but not beyond the verge of his fen, with a boundary wall in continuation to the back, also just within his feu. A, in building his house, instead of building a western gable, made use of B's gable, leaving a passage below the house 6 feet wide close to B's gable. Behind the house a passage to the well 6 feet wide was left unbuilt on close to B's boundary. In 1866 B's successors made openings in their boundary wall, which were used as an access to the passage. In 1892 A's successor in his feu brought an action against B's successor for declarator that he was entitled to build a wall on the extreme west of his feu, the effect of building such a wall being that the passage would require to be moved eastward to an extent equal to the breadth of the proposed wall, and that B's successor would not have access to the passage through the doors in his wall. Held that, on a sound construction of his titles, the pursuer was entitled to decree. Blair v. Strachan, March 14, 1894, p. 661.

House—Gable—Boundary—Prescription—Possession—Presumption.

2. The titles of two adjoining properties in a burgh described the properties (in so far as coterminous) as being each bounded by the other. About the year 1770 there was erected on the westmost of these properties a house, the scarcement stones of whose east gable extended about nine inches beyond the line of the gable. Some years after the building of this house there was erected on the other property a building which came to be used as a byre. This byre had no west gable of its own, the east gable of the other house being used as its west gable, and the north and south walls of the byre rested upon the scarcement stones of the gable of the other house, and were built against that gable. In 1892 the proprietor of the house on the westmost property proposed to project the roof of his house (which was higher than the byre), about seven inches to the east of his east gable, and, in an action by the proprietor of the byre for interdict against this proposed projection, maintained that the boundary of his property was the east line of the scarcement stones and not the east line of the gable of his house, contending that the presumption was that his author had built his house entirely within his own property. A proof shewed that the proprietor of the byre, and his authors, had, for more than the prescriptive period, possessed as belonging to the byre the entire area within the walls of the byre to the east of the defender's gable. Held that the pursuer's titles, coupled with the possession that had followed upon them, shewed that the boundary between the two properties was the east line of the gable and not the east line of the scarcement stones, and consequently that the pursuer was entitled to interdict against the defender projecting his roof as proposed. Houston v. M'Laren, June 22, 1894, p. 923.

Restrictions on building—Superior and Vassal—Feu-charter—Buildings similar in style and quality.

3. A feu-disposition contained a provision that the dwelling-houses to be erected on the feu by the feuar should be "similar in style and quality" to the tenements already erected by the superior in the same street in which the feu subjects were situated. The vassal erected a tenement containing dwelling-houses consisting of three or two rooms each. The tenements erected by the superior consisted of houses containing four or three rooms each. Externally the tenements were similar. Held that the tenement erected by the vassal was not in contravention of the stipulations of the feu-disposition. Middleton v. Leslie, May 23, 1894, p. 781.

Road—Obligation on disponent to maintain road—Conversion of road into a city street.

4. By disposition, dated in 1875, of a piece of ground in the burgh of Maryhill, near Glasgow, A, the disponent, became bound to construct a road and footpath through other lands belonging to him as an access to the ground disposed, and B, the disponent, became bound to pay a certain proportion "of the expense of maintaining the said road." In 1891 the burgh of Maryhill was included in the extended boundaries of the city of Glasgow, and the Glasgow Master of Works called on A to repair the road by putting in new water-channels of square dressed whinstone four feet broad, and covering the road with hand-broken whinstone metal. A having called on B to pay his proportion of the expense of such repair, and B having repudiated liability, A brought an action against B for declarator that the defender was bound to pay a proportion of the expense of the operations required by the Master of Works. B pleaded that as these operations were not of the character contemplated by the disposition, he was not liable. A proof shewed that the operations required by the Master of Works would greatly exceed in cost what would be necessary to restore the road to its original condition. Held that the pursuer was not entitled to decree of declarator as concluded for. Campbell's Trustees v. Scottish Union and National Insurance Co., Nov. 28, 1893, p. 167.

Road—Burgh—Reparation.

5. Held that the proprietor of a house in a public street within burgh, whose titles include the solum of the pavement in front of the house, is not relieved from the duty of maintaining the pavement in a safe condition for foot-passengers by the mere fact that the street is under the control and management of a public body, and that he will be liable in damages to foot-passengers who are injured through his neglect to fulfil this duty. Baillie v. Shearer's Judicial Factor, Feb. 1, 1894, p. 498.

Crofter—Nature of right in holding—March Fence—Crofters Holdings Act, 1886—Act 1661, c. 41.

6. Held that a crofter within the meaning of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, is the tenant, not the proprietor, of his holding, and that, therefore, he has no title to insist, under the Act 1661, c. 41, upon the proprietor of lands adjoining his croft paying half the cost of the march fence. MacDonald v. Dalgleish, June 12, 1894, p. 900.

See Fishing.

PROVIDENT SOCIETY. Jurisdiction—Dispute between society and member—Reference clause—Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876.

The rules of a provident society provided that in the event of any dispute between a member of the society, or any person claiming through a member, and the society, it must be referred to a committee of the society. In an action against the society at the instance of the executor-dative of a member to recover a sum alleged to be due by the society to the deceased, held that, as the defenders denied the pursuer's right to represent the deceased member, the question raised was not a dispute within the meaning of the rule, and that the jurisdiction of the Court was not ousted.

Held further, upon a construction of section 11, subsec. 6, of the above Act, that the society had acted ultra vires in paying to one only of the next of kin, he not being a person "entitled by law" to receive payment. Symington's Executor v. Galashiels Co-operative Store Co., Limited, Jan. 13, 1894, p. 371.

PUBLIC HEALTH. Purveyor of milk—Ice-cream—Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order of 1885.

1. Held that a seller of ice-cream was not a purveyor of milk within the meaning of the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order of 1885, sec. 1, subsec. 1. Lang v. Pianta, Jan. 22, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 20.

Precautions to prevent infection—Public conveyance—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, sec. 49.

2. Held (1) that no offence was committed under section 49 of the above Act, unless the patient was conveyed without proper precautions being taken against endangering the public safety by spreading infection; (2) that the onus lies upon the prosecutor to prove what precautions were necessary, and that they had not been used. Malloch v. Hunter, Jan. 22, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 22.

Sale of poisons by unqualified assistant—Pharmacy Act, 1868, sec. 15.

3. Held that upon a construction of the provisions of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, the penalty imposed by the 15th section is incurred by an unqualified assistant of a duly registered and qualified practitioner, where the assistant, in his master's absence and in his shop, sells any of the poisons scheduled in the Act for behoof of his master. Bremridge v. Tomlinson, June 1, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 46.

Appeal—Case stated—Criminal cause—Public Health Act, 1867—Housing of the Working-Classes Act, 1890—Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875.

4. Cause under the above Acts which was held not to be criminal, and therefore not to be appealable to the High Court on a case stated. Suburban District Committee of County Council of Midlothian v. Maitland, Jan. 19, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 11.

PUBLIC-HOUSE. Breach of certificate—Master and Servant—Responsibility of master for servant—Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862.

1. A barman, when in sole charge of licensed premises, before closing time sold a bottle of whisky to three of his friends, and after closing time (having shut up the shop) went into a room off the bar with his friends, where he and they consumed the whisky. Held that the servant in thus permitting drinking in the premises after closing time had not acted within the scope of his employment, and therefore that his master was not guilty of a breach of his certificate. Patrick v. Kirkhope, Jan. 23, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 27.

Travelling without a certificate—Relevancy—Ambiguous complaint—Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, secs. 17 and 37.

2. A complaint charged the accused with an offence against the Public-Houses Acts, and particularly sec. 17 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, in so far as, upon a date and at a place specified, "he did, with William Galbraith and Frank Lambert, traffic in whisky, or other exciseable liquors," without having a certificate in that behalf. The accused having been convicted, appealed. The Court sustained the appeal, on the ground that the complaint was irrelevant for ambiguity, in respect that it might mean either that the accused trafficked with the assistance of William Galbraith and Frank Lambert, or that he trafficked by selling to them.

Question whether a charge of "trafficking" in spirits without a certificate, without specification of the mode in which the offence was committed, was relevant. Carr v. Neilson, Jan. 23, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 29.

Public fair—Home Drummond Act, 1828, sec. 8—Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 6.

3. Held that the holder of a certificate for the sale of exciseable liquors under the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, is entitled under section 8 of the Home Drummond Act to sell liquor at a public fair or market in the same parish with his licensed premises, or in any adjoining parish, without obtaining special permission to do so under section 6 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862. Lamb v. Brown, March 5, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 35.

Club—Bona fides—Excise.

4. By one of the rules of admission to a working-men's club it was provided that intending members should only be admitted to the club by enrolment in a register (subject to the power of rejection by the committee), and upon payment of entry-money of 6d. and subscription of 3d. quarterly. This rule was habitually disregarded, and the barkeeper was authorised by the committee to admit any person whose appearance he considered respectable on payment of the club subscription of 3d. for three months without enrolment or payment of entry-money or consideration of the case by the committee. Held that whatever character the club might have possessed according to its written constitution, it was not, by reason of its permitting such a system of admission, a bona fide club, and that a sale of spirits to a member so admitted was a sale for which an Excise licence to retail spirits was required. Madin v. M'Lean, March 19, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 40.

Search warrant—Home Drummond Act, sec. 9—Public-Houses Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 20.

5. Held that notwithstanding the provision of the Home Drummond Act, sec. 9, a search warrant under sec. 20 of the Public-Houses Amendment (Scotland) Act may competently be granted by a Justice of the Peace who is a licence-holder. Costadasi v. Boyes, July 20, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 75.

Summary Procedure—Complaint—Relevancy—"On Sunday or about that time"—Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862.

6. A person was convicted of a breach of his certificate upon a complaint which set forth that he did sell liquor "upon Sunday the 31st day of December 1893, or about that time." Held in an appeal by him upon a case stated under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, that the complaint was irrelevant in respect that the words "or about that time" must be taken as including the days immediately before and after the Sunday specified, and therefore as including hours on Saturday and Monday when the sale would not have been an offence. Macdonald v. Patterson, March 5, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 38.

Title to sue—Declarator—Construction of statute.

7. The magistrates of a police burgh having intimated that they claimed, under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, to be the licensing authority for the sale of exciseable liquors within the burgh, a publican holding a licence for premises in the burgh, which had been granted by the county Justices, brought an action for declarator that the licensing jurisdiction within the burgh had not been transferred from the county Justices to the burgh magistrates, and for interdict against the magistrates acting as the licensing authority. Held that the pursuer had a title to sue. Tennent v. Magistrates of Partick, March 20, 1894, p. 735.

8. Held that the right of granting, refusing, renewing, and transferring certificates, under the Public-Houses Acts, for premises within police burghs has not been transferred under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 38, from the county Justices to the Magistrates of such burghs. *Tennent v. RAILWAY. Railways and Canals—“Company”—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854, secs. 20 and 21.

1. Held that the words “canal company” in the section applied to a body of statutory commissioners who were charged with the administration of a canal when the Act was passed. Commissioners of the Caledonian Canal v. County Councils of Inverness and Argyll, July 18, 1894, p. 1045.

Compulsory powers—Omission to give notice to treat through mistake or inadvertency—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, sec. 117.

2. Held that the above section did not apply to cases in which the promoters did not, prior to the expiry of the period allowed for compulsory purchase, intend to acquire the omitted estate, right, interest, or charge. Davidson’s Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co., July 19, 1894, p. 1960.

Compulsory powers—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, sec. 84—Interest on purchase-money from date of entering on land.

3. Held (1) that when the owner of lands entered upon dispenses with the granting of the bond mentioned in the above section, he is nevertheless entitled to 5 per cent interest upon the compensation from the date of the promoters entering upon his land till the compensation is paid; and (2) that he is entitled to payment of such interest out of the sum deposited by the promoters. West Highland Railway Co. v. Place, Feb. 21, 1894, p. 576.

Compulsory powers—Accommodation works—Process—Sheriff—Appeal—Competency—Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 61.

4. Held that no appeal lies to the Court of Session against a determination of a Sheriff-substitute under this section. Main v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co., Dec. 19, 1893, p. 323.

5. Held that sec. 61 applies not only to a difference between the company and the owner and occupier, but also to a difference between the owner and the occupier, and that each of these as well as the railway company should be before the Sheriff in order to the determination of any dispute relative to the accommodation works to be executed. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co. v. Main, July 17, 1894, p. 1018.

6. The proprietor of lands intersected by a railway, who had agreed with the railway company as to the accommodation works to be provided, brought an action for reduction of a determination subsequently pronounced by the Sheriff as to the accommodation works on an application by the occupier of the lands under sec. 61 of the Railway Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845. The pursuer averred that he was not called as a party to the application by the defender, and that it was only at the final stage, after he had become aware of the nature of the proceedings, that he sisted himself as a party and asked the Sheriff to be allowed to lodge written answers to the petition, or at least to have time given him to consider his position; that this had been refused, and that he had had no opportunity given him of stating his objections. Held that the pursuer’s averment that the Sheriff had not allowed him time to inform himself as to the proceedings was a relevant ground of reduction. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co. v. Main, July 17, 1894, p. 1018.

Compulsory powers—Mines and Minerals—Freestone—Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 70.

7. Held that the exception of "mines of coal, ironstone, slate, and other minerals," in the 70th section of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, from conveyances of land to railway companies covers freestone. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. v. Bain, Nov. 15, 1893, p. 134.

Compulsory powers—Mines and Minerals—Notice—Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 71.

8. A quarry-master having given notice to a railway company, under the 71st section of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, that he intended to work certain freestone belonging to him under the company's line, the company brought a note of suspension and interdict, averring, inter alia, that in the ordinary course of working the quarry the freestone in question would not be worked for many years, and that the notice had not been bona fide given, but was merely intended to raise up a fictitious claim against the company. Held that these averments were relevant, and a proof allowed. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. v. Bain, Nov. 15, 1893, p. 134.

Compulsory powers—Issue—Reparation.

9. Form of issue to try a question whether a railway company had exercised its statutory powers negligently to the damage of adjoining property. M'Bride v. Caledonian Railway Company, March 7, 1894, p. 620.

Running powers—Joint station—Statute—Construction—Caledonian and Scottish North-Eastern Railways Amalgamation Act, 1866.

10. Held (rev. the judgment of the First Division) that section 106 of the above Act giving the North British Railway Company the joint or separate use of the stations on the Scottish North-Eastern lines, "including, in so far as the [Caledonian] Company lawfully may, the station at Aberdeen," was to be read as giving the use of the Scottish North-Eastern stations, "including, in so far as the Caledonian Company lawfully may include, the station at Aberdeen"; (2) that the Caledonian Company had no right to give the use of the Aberdeen station without the consent of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, the other joint proprietor thereof; and (3) that the pursuers, the Aberdeen Joint Station Committee and the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, were entitled to declarator that the North British Company were not entitled without the consent of the Great North of Scotland Company to use the joint passenger station for the purposes of their traffic. Aberdeen Joint Station Committee and Great North of Scotland Railway Co. v. North British Railway Co., Nov. 14, 1893, H. L., p. 48.

Statutory obligation to stop trains—"Ordinary trains."

11. A railway company was bound under its Act to stop "all ordinary trains" at a certain station. Trains which were held to be ordinary trains in the sense of the Act. Gilmour v. North British Railway Co., May 17, 1894, p. 765.

Bills posted up in stations by a railway company setting forth convictions for offences against company—Reparation—Slander.

12. A railway company is not liable in damages for slander by posting up in its stations bills announcing the names and addresses of persons who have been convicted of the offence of travelling without having previously paid the fare, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, or of other offences against the company's acts and bye-laws, together with the date and nature of the offence and the result of the conviction. REPARATION. Title to sue—Injury to property—Evidence that a disposition ex facie absolute was really in security.

1. In 1880 A, the owner of house property, granted for onerous causes and considerations an ex facie absolute disposition thereof to a bank to which he owed £2500. The bank was infert. In 1893 A raised an action against a railway company for damage done to the property in 1890. Held that it had been proved that A's disposition in 1880 was in security merely, and that as he had not been divested of the radical right to the subjects he had a good title to sue. M'Bride v. Caledonian Railway Co., March 7, 1894, p. 620.

Title to sue—Acquisition of right and title after action raised.

2. A, the purchaser of a vessel from B, brought an action of damages in his own name and as an assignee of B against C for injuries which had been done to the vessel prior to the date of the purchase. The summons was served on the 28th June 1893. On the 29th June the seller of the ship assigned to A all claims competent to him against C. Held (1) that at the date of the action A had no right to damages for injury done to the vessel prior to his purchase, and had no title to sue; and (2) that the subsequent assignation did not remedy the defect. Symington v. Campbell, Jan. 30, 1894, p. 434.

Persons liable—County Council—Road.

3. Held that a claim of damages is competent against a county council for injuries arising from their neglect of duty in failing to keep a road sufficiently fenced. Strachan v. Aberdeen District Committee of the County Council of Aberdeenshire, June 19, 1894, p. 915.

Persons liable—Right in security—Mails and duties.

4. Held that the creditor under a bond and disposition in security entering into possession of the security subjects under a decree of mails and duties and conducting himself as owner thereof, to the exclusion of the true owner, incurs the liabilities of an owner in questions with the public. Baillie v. Shearer's Judicial Factor, Feb. 1, 1894, p. 498.

Persons liable—Road—Burgh.

Persons liable—Road—Burgh—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 326.

6. Held that the owner of the solum of a pavement adjoining his house in a public street is liable in damages for an accident caused to a member of the public by the defective state of the pavement, unless the pavement had been taken over by the board of police in terms of sec. 326 of the above Act. *Baillie v. used in discharging a ship's cargo raised an action against the shipowner and the stevedore who was using the tackle at the time of the accident for damages, the fault alleged against the former being that his tackle was unfit for the work, and that alleged against the latter being that he had recklessly overloaded the tackle. The pursuer obtained decree against both the shipowner and the stevedore, jointly and severally, for a sum of damages and expenses. Thereafter she gave the shipowner a charge for payment of the whole sum. He paid it and obtained from her an assignation to the sum of damages and expenses, and to the decree. He then raised an action against the stevedore for half that sum. The stevedore pleaded in defence that the action was incompetent and irrelevant, in respect that there is no contribution between wrongdoers. Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that the shipowner was entitled to recover half of the damages and expenses from the stevedore, because he was in right of the decree against the latter; and that the rule that there is no contribution between wrongdoers was inapplicable. Palmer v. Wick and Pulteneytown Steam Shipping Co., Limited, June 5, 1894, H. L., p. 39.

Police—Abortive assessment—Action of damages against collector—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 106.

8. An action by the Police Commissioners of a burgh against a ratepayer of the burgh for recovery of a private improvement assessment imposed by them was dismissed on the ground that the ratepayer had not received notice of the imposition of the assessment at least two weeks before the day fixed for the hearing of appeals, as required by section 106 of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862. The Commissioners then raised an action against their collector for payment of the amount of the assessment, averring that their failure to recover the assessment had occurred through his neglect to send the notice within the statutory time. The Court dismissed the action, holding that the pursuers had not proved loss through the defender's fault, in respect that it had not been determined whether the sum sued for might not still be recovered from the ratepayer by re-imposing the assessment and giving him timeous notice under the statute. Glasgow Police Commissioners v. Donald, June 12, 1894, p. 895.

Railway—Statutory powers—Negligence—Issue.

9. Form of issue to try a question whether a railway company had exercised its statutory powers negligently to the damage of adjoining property. M'Bride v. Caledonian Railway Co., March 7, 1894, p. 620.

Road—Burgh—Regulation of traffic.

10. In order to ease the traffic passing up a steep street in Glasgow, there was laid down a stone track which led up on the right hand side of the street for a considerable distance, and then passed diagonally across it. At one point the track was only 18 inches from the pavement, between which and it there was a rough gutter 6 inches below the kerbstone of the pavement, and sloping gently upward to the track, which was about a foot above the gutter. The rule of the road was, according to these arrangements, reversed for traffic going up and down the street. A child of five years old while playing at the point referred to tripped in the gutter, and falling on to the track was run over by a cart and killed. The track had been for a long time in the same condition without accident. In an action of damages by the child's father against the Police Commissioners founded upon the position of the track and condition of the gutter, held that no fault was attributable to the defenders. Scott v. Glasgow Police Commissioners, Jan. 31, 1894, p. 466.

Ship—Danger to ship at quay—Obstruction by vessel lying outside and parallel—Right to cut mooring ropes of outside vessel to escape danger.

11. While the s.s. "Dunlossit" was lying at a quay the s.s. "Easdale" came in, in the evening, took up her position outside and close to the "Dunlossit," and moored herself to the shore by ropes crossing the stem and stern of the "Dunlossit." A gale rose during the night, and the position of both vessels became perilous. During the night the master of the "Dunlossit" repeatedly asked the master of the "Easdale" to move, so that the "Dunlossit" might escape, but the master of the "Easdale" did not do so. In the morning the master of the "Dunlossit," after giving warning of his intention, cut the mooring ropes of the "Easdale" and steamed away. The "Easdale" was then driven ashore by the wind and damaged. In an action of damages at the instance of the owner of the "Easdale" against the owners of the "Dunlossit," held that the cutting of the ropes was prima facie an illegal act, and that the defenders had failed to justify it, and were therefore liable in damages for the consequences of the act. Currie v. Allan, July 17, 1894, p. 1004.

Personal injury—Process—Jury trial—Verdict.

12. In an action by a widow for damages on account of the death of her husband, which had been caused by a large gate belonging to the defenders falling on him, the defence was that the gate had been nailed up by order of the defenders, they not intending that it should thereafter be used as a gate, and that it had been opened without their knowledge and consent. The presiding Judge told the jury that even if they found that the gate when used as a gate was unsafe, the defenders would not be liable for the accident, if it was proved that it had been shut up by order of the defenders, and had not thereafter been used as a gate with their knowledge and consent. The jury returned an unanimous verdict for the defenders, but added this rider, as noted by the presiding Judge, "while accepting unanimously the law as laid down by your Lordship, we do not think that a due measure of supervision and care over the gate in question had been exercised by" the defenders. The verdict having been entered for the defenders, the pursuer moved for a rule to shew cause why a new trial should not be granted. The Court refused the motion, holding that the rider was not inconsistent with the verdict. Burns v. Steel Co. of Scotland, Limited, Nov. 7, 1893, p. 39.

Personal injury—Hired vehicle—Responsibility of hirer for fault of owner.

Personal injury—Road—Horse frightened by manure piled on ground adjoining road—Occupation of ground by trespasser.

14. In an action of damages for personal injury the pursuer averred that the defender was the proprietor of a farm of which the pursuer was tenant, and from which he was to remove at Whitsunday; that before the term of removal the defender entered on a field on the farm and placed thereon a heap of bags of manure covered with a tarpaulin, which flapped in the wind, close to the private road leading to the farm-house; that on 12th May, while the pursuer was driving along the road his horse shied at the manure bags, and overturned the conveyance, whereby the pursuer was seriously injured. He further averred that the defender in placing the bags where he did was a trespasser on the ground in the pursuer's occupation. Held (1) that the pursuer's averments, apart from the statement as to trespass, were not relevant to support an issue of fault on the part of the defender in placing the manure near the road; but (2) that he was entitled to an issue whether the defender wrongfully placed the bags of manure upon a field in the occupation of the pursuer, and whether the pursuer was injured by his horse taking fright thereat. Gibson v. Stewart, Jan. 30, 1894, p. 437.

Personal injury—Relevancy—Specification of fault.

15. In an action of damages for personal injuries the defenders maintained that the action was not relevant, as no specific fault on their part had been set forth. Held that the action was relevant. Olipphant v. Johnstone & Macleod, Feb. 3, 1894, p. 531.

16. In defence to an action by a workman against his employers for damages for personal injury, at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, the defenders proved that they had posted at various places in their works, including the pay-box, notices to the effect that from the weekly wages paid to the workmen certain sums would be deducted, to secure certain insurance benefits in case of accident, and that any workman accepting such benefits would be held to have discharged all claims against his employers. It was further proved that the notice was well known to the defenders' workmen generally, and that the pursuer had taken benefit of the insurance. The Court assolized the defenders, holding (1) that the conditions founded on were lawful conditions of the contract of employment; and (2) that on the evidence the pursuer must be held to have known of and assented to the conditions. Wright v. Howard, Baker, & Co., Oct. 26, 1893, p. 25.

Master and Servant—Personal injury—Liability at common law.

17. Action at common law for damages for personal injury by a workman against his employers dismissed as irrelevant, on the ground that, on the pursuer's own shewing, the proximate cause of the accident was due to the fault of one or other of his fellow-workmen. Baxter v. Abernethy & Co., Nov. 25, 1893, p. 159.

Master and Servant—Factory—Mill-gearing—Fencing—Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, sec. 5, subsec. 3, sec. 96, and sec. 9—Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, sec. 6, subsec. 2—Contributory negligence.

18. When a worker in a factory is injured by an accident which would not have happened if the mill-gearing had been properly fenced in terms of the statute, the employer will not be liberated from liability by the fact that the accident was partly due to a mistake on the part of the worker. Pringle v. Grosvenor, Feb. 3, 1894, p. 532.

Slander—Issue—Two pursuers claiming separate damages in one action.

19. Held (1) that it is competent for two persons alleging injury by one calumnious statement to claim damages in one action provided the damages due to each are separately concluded for; and (2) that in such an action each pursuer must take a separate issue. Mitchell v. Grierson, Jan. 13, 1894, p. 367.

Slander—Statements in reply to previous attack—Innuendo—Counter issue.

20. M. wrote a letter to a newspaper in which, after charging various tradesmen, who had been the contractors for the supply of provisions to a school in Rothesay of which M. was governor with having supplied inferior goods, he stated that he had detected W., who had contracted to supply groceries, in trying to send a different, and, he believed, a cheaper brand of coffee than that contracted for. W. replied by a letter to a newspaper in which he made the following remarks upon M.'s letter:—"Every sentence of this contribution mirrors with startling significance the man M. Meant to be an exposure of a number of Rothesay gentlemen, every line exposes the true nature of the man who wrote it. Perhaps none will feel the sting of the letter so much as those whom he so gushingly thanks in the same breath as he levels his vile statements against so many of our prominent townsmen. . . . If I am able to shew that the statement made as regards myself is a consummate lie, the other statements in M.'s letter may be put down in the same category. I hereby charge this man with a deliberate and wilful untruth contained in what he says with reference to my supplying the school with goods." In an action of damages for slander by M. against W., and also against the publisher of the letter, the pursuer averred that by the letter the defender had represented that the pursuer "had no regard for truth and was a liar." The Court held (1) that the letter as innuendoed was more than a reply to the pursuer's charge, and that the pursuer was entitled to an issue whether the statement in the defender's letter represented that the pursuer had no regard for truth and was a liar; (2) that the defender was not entitled to a counter issue, whether the pursuer's statement regarding the coffee contract was a lie, as not fully meeting the pursuer's issue. Milne v. Walker, Nov. 24, 1893, p. 155.

Slander—Verbal injury—Innuendo—Issue.

21. A newspaper, commenting on the manner in which a contract for printing a register of voters had been secured, said—"This contract was secured by the lowest offerer in a mean and contemptible manner. We attach no blame to any of the burgh officials, but to the unfair advantage taken by the successful offerer to secure the contract." The successful offerer brought an action against the printer and publisher of the newspaper, in which he innuendosed the statement to mean that he had obtained the contract by dishonest and improper means. He also averred that the statement had been made with the design and the result of injuring him. The Court held that the statement would bear the innuendo put upon it, and allowed the pursuer an issue of slander, but that the pursuer was not entitled to an issue of verbal injury.

Paterson v. Welch, May 31, 1893, 20 R. 744, commented on. Waddell v. Roxburgh, June 9, 1894, p. 883.

Slander—Slanderous attributing of letter—Innuendo—Issue.

22. Terms of letter on which it was held (1) that the words could be innuendosed as an incitement to riot and bloodshed, and (2) that it was slanderous to attribute to the pursuer the authorship of the letter. Terms of the issue adjusted to try the cause. Waugh v. Ayrshire Post, Limited, Dec. 22, 1893, p. 326.

Slander—Accusation of drunkenness—Master and Servant.

23. The head cook in a hotel raised an action of damages against her master, alleging that, being in a violent temper with her for asking for additional assistants in the kitchen, he had called out to her in a loud voice several times in a public part of the hotel, and in presence of several of her fellow-servants, "You are drunk and must go at once"; and further averring that these statements were false, malicious, and without probable cause, were injurious to the character of the pursuer, and hurtful to her feelings, and were made by the defender without taking the trouble to ascertain whether they were true or not and "simply to browbeat" the pursuer. Held that the action was irrelevant. Macdonald v. Rupprecht, Jan. 19, 1894, p. 389.

Slander—Bills posted up in stations by railway company setting forth convictions for offences against company.

24. A railway company is not liable in damages for slander by posting up in its stations bills announcing the names and addresses of persons who have been convicted of the offence of travelling without having previously paid the fare, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, or of other offences against the company's Acts and bye-laws, together with the date and nature of the offence and the result of the conviction. Buchan v. North British Railway Co., Jan. 16, 1894, p. 379.

Slander—Issue—Counter Issue—Veritas.

25. In an action of damages for slander brought by an elder against a parish minister, the pursuer obtained an issue whether certain statements made by the defender on 16th July 1893 falsely and calumniously represented "that the pursuer was addicted to taking strong drink to excess, and that this was notorious to the parishioners. . . ." The defender who pleaded veritas, and set forth on record a number of occasions, giving dates and places, from 1887 onwards, on which he alleged that the pursuer had been intoxicated, proposed a counter issue in general terms. The Court, having regard to the specific averments on record to which the proof would be limited, allowed the counter issue. Hunter v. MacNaughton, June 5, 1894, p. 850.

Wrongous apprehension—Apprehension without a warrant.

26. In an action of damages for illegal apprehension brought by a seaman

against a sergeant of police, the pursuer averred that while he was engaged in regular employment on board a trading steamer he had been arrested by the defender, without a warrant, on a charge of having received 10s. 7d. six months previously by false representations; and that the defender, having handcuffed the pursuer, took him from Leith (where he had been arrested) to Edinburgh and thence to Falkirk, where he was tried and acquitted. Held that the action was relevant. Leask v. Burt, Oct. 28, 1893, p. 32.

Wrongous apprehension—Liability of master for act of servant—Issue—Malice and want of probable cause—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862, secs. 35 and 37.

27. In an action of damages brought by a passenger against the owner of a passenger steamer, the pursuer averred that he had been wrongously apprehended by a purser in the employment of the defender, on the ground that he had refused to pay his fare. Held that the action was relevant, in respect (1) that the defender had a statutory power to arrest on the ground alleged, and (2) that, on the averments of the pursuer, the purser had acted within the scope of his employment as a servant of the defender, and an issue whether the defender had "wrongfully and illegally" caused the apprehension approved. Lundie v. Macbrayne, July 20, 1894, p. 1085.

Wrongous prosecution—Limitation of action—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 35.

28. Held that although a complaint bearing to be under the above Act had been quashed on account of defective instance, it was not the less a proceeding under the Act, and consequently that an action of damages for wrongous prosecution raised more than two months after the date of the complaint was barred by section 35. Lundie v. Macbrayne, July 20, 1894, p. 1085.

Taking decree in absence for debt paid after action raised—Agent and principal—Malice—Want of probable cause—Issue.

29. In an action for damages brought by B against X, a debt collector, the pursuer averred that the defender had been employed by A to recover a claim against the pursuer, and that the defender had raised an action in A's name in the Debts Recovery Court against him; that two hours before the diet of appearance X had received notice from A that the debt and expenses had been paid, and instructions to stop proceedings, but that notwithstanding he had maliciously caused decree in absence to be taken against B. Form of issue adjusted, in which "malice," but not "want of probable cause," was inserted. Rhind v. Kemp & Co., Dec. 13, 1893, p. 275.

Wrongous use of diligence—Bank—Cheque.

30. Young, a writer in Glasgow, who had been instructed by a client to recover the sum due by Macdougall under a decree on which a charge expired on 29th December, on that day wrote to Macdougall, who lived in Dunoon, that unless the debt was paid next day a poiding would be executed, and payment not having been made, he, on 31st December, instructed a sheriff-officer to execute a poiding of Macdougall's furniture in Dunoon. On 3d January Young received from Macdougall a cheque for the amount due, but on presenting it at the bank he was informed that there were no funds to meet the cheque. He accordingly returned it to Macdougall. Macdougall returned the cheque to Young next day, 4th January, with a letter intimating that there were now funds in the bank. The cheque reached Macdougall's office about two o'clock on the 4th January, when he was absent on business, but his clerk ascertained from the bank that there were funds to meet the cheque, and Young was informed of this on his return to his office after bank hours that day. Next day, at about eleven o'clock, he presented the cheque (which was crossed) at his own bank with instructions to have it specially presented at Macdougall's bank. This was done, and Young was informed about two o'clock that day that the cheque had been paid. He then wrote to the sheriff-officer countermanding the pouncing. It had, however, been executed about one o'clock that day. Founding on these circumstances, Macdougall brought an action of damages for illegal pouncing against Young and his client. Held that Young's retention of the cheque on 4th January imported merely the duty of duly presenting it for payment, and, if paid, of duly countermanding the pouncing, that he had in fact so presented the cheque and countermanded the pouncing, and therefore that the defenders fell to be assoilzied. Macdougall v. M'Nab, Nov. 21, 1893, p. 144.

38. Entail—Disentail—Liability of curator ad litem to next heir for insufficient security. Maxwell Heron v. Dunlop, Dec. 8, 1893, p. 230.

RETENTION. General lien—Fraud—Lessee holding himself out as true owner—Rollers for calico printing—Custom of trade.

W. M. let out on hire to M. J. & Co., calico printers, certain copper rollers, on an agreement that the rollers should be marked with his name, and that in the event of M. J. & Co. parting with the custody of the rollers to any third person they should be delivered under a receipt bearing that they were "received from W. M." M. J. & Co., who had no printing works of their own, in accordance with a custom in the trade, sent their cloth with the rollers to be printed by H. & Sons, to whom they falsely represented that the rollers were their own property. M. J. & Co. having become insolvent, H. & Sons refused to deliver the rollers to W. M., on the ground that by an admitted custom of trade calico printers employed to print for others had a general lien over the cloth and rollers sent to them. Held that as M. J. & Co. had no power to subject W. M.'s rollers to the lien of H. & Sons, and as W. M. had done nothing to mislead H. & Sons into the belief that the rollers were the property of M. J. & Co., he was entitled to recover them. Mitchell v. Heys & Sons, Feb. 27, 1894, p. 600.

REVENUE. Income-tax—Investment Trust Company—Profits or gains—Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842, Schedule D—First case.

1. The memorandum of association of a company stated that its objects were to raise money by share capital and invest the same in stocks and shares, to vary "the investments of the company, and generally to sell, exchange, or otherwise dispose of, deal with, or turn to account any of the assets of the company." Held that gains made by the company by realising investments at larger prices than those paid for them were to be reckoned as "profits and gains" of the company, in the sense of the Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842, Schedule D. Scottish Investment Trust Co. Limited, v. Inland Revenue, Dec. 12, 1893, p. 262.

REVENUE—Continued.

Income-tax—Deductions for wear and tear—Obsolete type of ship—Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 100, Schedule D, Case I. Rule iii.—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, sec. 12.

2. Held that the owners of a ship engaged in trade were not entitled under section 12 of the Act of 1878 to a deduction for depreciation in the value of their ship caused by ships of a better construction being built. Burnley Steamship Co., Limited, v. Surveyor of Taxes, July 10, 1894, p. 965.

Income-tax—Abatement—"Income"—Official residence—Manse—Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 167, Schedules A and E—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876, sec. 8.

3. The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876, sec. 8, allows an abatement from income-tax to a person assessed when "his total income from all sources" is less than £400. Held that the annual value of a manse occupied rent free by the minister of a congregation of the Free Church of Scotland, the feudal title to which was in trustees for behoof of the congregation, did not fall to be reckoned as "income" of the minister in the sense of the above section. Inland Revenue v. Sutherland, March 20, 1894, p. 753.

Inhabited house duty—Exemption—Business premises—Messengers—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, sec. 13, subsec. 2—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, sec. 24.

4. Held (1) that the words "for the protection thereof" in sec. 13, subsec. 2, of the Act of 1878 applied to "servant" as well as to "other person"; (2) that this construction was not modified by sec. 24 of the Act of 1881; and (3) that an insurance company were not within the exemption, in respect that two messengers who occupied the premises at night did not reside in the premises solely for the protection thereof. Inland Revenue v. Standard Life Assurance Co., May 29, 1894, p. 820.

Inventory-duty—Stamp-duty on accounts—Voluntary settlement—Reservation of interest in property settled—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, sec. 38, subsec. 2 (c)—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, sec. 11, subsec. 1.

5. In 1887 W transferred to three of his sons, who formed a copartnership, the whole stock in trade and goodwill of his business. No cash was paid down by his sons, but they undertook, both as individuals and as a firm, to grant a bond of annuity in favour of their father, and after his death of their mother, equivalent to 5 per cent on the value of the stock in trade. The bond was in no way secured on the business. The sons further, in consideration of their father entering into the arrangement, discharged all claims competent to them on his death to any share of his estate. W died in 1893. In an action at the instance of the Inland Revenue to recover duty on the property so acquired by his sons, held that the transfer of the business was a voluntary settlement within the meaning of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, sec. 38, subsec. 2, and that the annuity was an interest in the business reserved by implication to the settlor, and therefore that duty was payable. Lord Advocate v. Wilson, July 17, 1894, p. 997.

Inventory and legacy-duties—Double duties—Legatees identified by reference to will of another testator—Power of disposal—Stamp-Duties, &c., Act, 1845, sec. 4—Stamp-Duties Act, 1860, sec. 4.

6. A bequeathed one-third of the residue of her estate to B, and failing him to his executors and representatives. B predeceased A, leaving a will, under which he appointed executors. In addition to the inventory and legacy-duties payable by A's executors the Crown claimed inventory and legacy-duties from B's executors on one-third of A's residue on the ground that it had been disposed of by B's will. Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that B's executors were not liable for the duties claimed, as B had no power to dispose of, and had not disposed of, any part of A's estate. Lord Advocate v. Bogie, March 6, 1894, H. L., p. 6.

REVENUE—Continued.

Legacy-duty—Legacy compounded for less than the amount thereof—Act 36 Geo. III. cap. 52, secs. 23 and 37.

7. A competition between a person claiming a bequest on behalf of a class of beneficiaries under a will and the next of kin (a niece) of the testator, who maintained that the bequest was void from uncertainty, was terminated by joint minute under which each party received one-half of the subject of the bequest. The Court interposed authority to the minute, and in terms thereof ranked and preferred each claimant to one-half of the fund. The Crown then claimed legacy-duty at the rate of 10 per cent on the whole fund, on the ground that as the bequest had not been set aside the rate of duty for the whole was that payable by strangers in blood to the testator. The testator's next of kin maintained that the rate of duty on the half payable to her under the arrangement ought to be 3 per cent only. Held that, under section 23 of the Act, the bequest having been released for payment of one-half of its amount, duty at the rate of 10 per cent was payable on that half only, and that the half payable to the next of kin was liable to 3 per cent duty. Lord Advocate v. Freckleton's Judicial Factor, May 20, 1894, p. 743.

Legacy-duty—Entail—Money directed to be invested in land to be entailed—“Estate of inheritance”—36 Geo. III. cap. 52, secs. 12 and 19.

8. Testamentary trustees were directed, during the period of six years next after the testator's death, to realise the residue of the trust-estate, and to purchase land to be entailed on A and a series of heirs. At the end of the six years A, whose right then vested, presented a petition for disentail, and having by private arrangement obtained the consents of the next three heirs on payment of compensation for their respective interests, as ascertained by an extra-judicial valuation, he obtained a decree ordaining the trustees to convey to him in fee-simple the lands and the moneys held by them for investment in land. The Crown thereupon claimed from the trustees legacy-duty upon the capital of the whole residue of the moveable estate, under the 19th section of the Act 36 Geo. III. c. 52. Held (in aff. judgment of First Division) (1) that the words “shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in real estate” fell to be construed as meaning shall become entitled, if real estate is purchased, to an estate of inheritance in possession; (2) that under the entail directed to be executed A, as institute, would have had an estate of inheritance in possession; and therefore (3) that under the will, and apart from the disentail proceedings, A was liable in duty on the whole residue in terms of the proviso in section 19 of the Act.

Opinions that if A had been originally liable to duty on his life interest only, he would have become liable under sec. 12, to duty on the whole residue on his acquiring an absolute interest by the disentail proceedings.

Held further (aff. judgment of First Division) that money expended in building a mansion-house was not money expended in the purchase of real estate. Macfarlane v. Lord Advocate, June 1, 1894, H. L., p. 28.

9. With reference to the same succession held also (by the First Division) that a sum expended in the purchase of land prior to the lapse of the six years was exempt from legacy-duty. Lord Advocate v. Dunlop's Trustees, Jan. 12, 1894, p. 348.

RIGHT IN SECURITY. Bond and disposition in security—Mails and duties—Reparation.

1. Held that the creditor under a bond and disposition in security entering into possession of the security subjects under a decree of mails and duties and conducting himself as owner thereof, to the exclusion of the true owner, incurs the liabilities of an owner in questions with the public. Baillie v. Shearer's Judicial Factor, Feb. 1, 1894, p. 498.

Bond and disposition in security—Assignment—Unconditional offer and acceptance—Implement—Defect in bond.

3. The holders of a bond and disposition in security having advertised the security subjects for sale, the firm of A & B, who had a reversionary interest in the subjects, in consideration of the bondholders having agreed to withdraw the subjects from sale, bound themselves, by letter, personally to take an assignment of the bond and to pay the amount therein with interest. This was agreed to by letter, and the subjects were withdrawn from sale. Thereafter A & B refused to implement the contract, on the ground that they had discovered that the bond was not a valid security over the subjects quoad the interest, and that its validity in this respect was an implied condition of their obligation. In an action at the instance of the holders of the bond against A & B for implement of the contract, held that A & B were bound to take over the bond whether it was defective or not. Forbes v. Welsh & Forbes, March 8, 1894, p. 630.

Bond and disposition in security—Bond for indefinite sum—Rate of interest not specified.

4. Held by Lord Low (Ordinary) that a heritable bond for a principal sum "with interest," the rate not being specified, did not constitute a valid security quoad the interest, as bearing to impose a burden of indefinite amount. Opinions in the Inner-House reserved. Forbes v. Welsh & Forbes, March 8, 1894, p. 630.

Ex facie absolute disposition—Evidence that a disposition ex facie absolute was really in security—Title to sue.

5. In 1880 A, the owner of house property, granted for onerous causes and considerations an ex facie absolute disposition thereof to a bank to which he owed £2500. The bank was infest. In 1893 A raised an action against the railway company for the damage done to the property in 1890. Held that it had been proved that A's disposition in 1880 was in security merely, and that as he had not been divested of the radical right to the subjects he had a good title to sue. M'Bride v. Caledonian Railway Co., March 7, 1894, p. 620.

Ex facie absolute disposition and recorded back-letter—Sale by creditor—Sale by private bargain.

6. B was infest in heritable subjects on an ex facie absolute disposition granted by A. Subsequently a minute of agreement between A and B was recorded, which provided that on repayment of an advance made by B to A, the former should be bound to reconvey the subjects to A, but that in the meanwhile B's right to sell the subjects should "remain as entire as if this minute of agreement had not been entered into and as if the absolute right of proprietorship and beneficial interest of the said B had been in no way qualified by this minute of agreement; and further, that in the event of the creditor selling the said subjects, or any part or portion thereof, which he is specially authorised to do as aforesaid, and that at any time or times, by public roup or private bargain," he should be bound to account to the debtor for any balance in his hands after repayment of his advances. The creditor sold the subjects by private bargain and tendered a conveyance granted by himself alone. The buyer objected to the title offered. In an action by the seller for implement of the contract of sale, held that the conveyance offered was sufficient, the seller being entitled to sell by private bargain. Duncan v. Mitchell & Co., Nov. 3, 1893, p. 37.

Lease—Trade fixtures.

7. A tenant assigned to his landlord certain trade fixtures on the subjects let, in security of advances. In a question between the landlord and the tenant's creditors, held that the fixtures being partes soli were the property of the landlord, and that the tenant's assignation operated as a valid renunciation of his right to remove them so long as the debt was not paid. Miller v. Muirhead, March 10, 1894, p. 658.

Pledge—Bill of lading.

8. Bill of lading handed over in security of loan—Handing of bill of lading to borrowers, as agents for lenders, to obtain delivery of the goods, and to sell for behoof of lenders. Held that by handing over bill of lading the lenders had lost their real security. North-Western Bank, Limited, v. Poynter, Son, & Macdonald, Feb. 2, 1894, p. 513.

See Entail, 1—Sale, 6.

RIVER. River navigable but non-tidal—Fishings—Trout-fishing.

In a question between a riparian proprietor and a member of the public, held (1) that a right in the public of being at or on the non-tidal portion of a river for the purposes of navigation does not entitle them to fish for trout therein, and (2) that such a right of fishing cannot be acquired by prescriptive use. Grant v. Henry, Jan. 12, 1894, p. 358.

ROAD. Public Road—Water-pipe—Compulsory Powers—Ultra vires—Railway—Statute—Construction—Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847, secs. 28 and 29.

1. Public water commissioners had statutory authority to lay a line of water-pipes along a road which passed over two girder bridges belonging to a railway company. Held, upon a construction of secs. 28 and 29 of the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847, that it was ultra vires of the commissioners to carry the pipes through the stone abutments of the bridges and to sling them from the girders. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. v. Magistrates of Glasgow, July 17, 1894, p. 1033.

Public right of way for foot-passengers over road suited for carriage traffic—Right of proprietor to erect gates to prevent carriage traffic.

2. Held (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark) that the proprietor of a road, which was suited for carriage traffic, and of the whole of which the public had been found entitled to "the free use," for foot-passengers only, was entitled to erect, and to keep locked, gates at each end of the road, across the carriage-way, for the purpose of preventing any public traffic along the road other than that of foot-passengers, swing-gates being left unlocked at each end sufficient to permit the entrance and egress of foot-passengers. Lord Donington v. Mair, May 31, 1894, p. 829.

Declaration by County Council that road should cease to be highway—Sheriff—Finality of Sheriff's judgment—Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, secs. 3, 42, and 43.

3. A County Council having determined that a particular road should cease to be a highway, three ratepayers appealed to the Sheriff, pleading (1) that it was incompetent for the County Council to declare that the road should cease to be a highway in respect that it was part of a road which extended beyond the confines of the county; and (2) that if competent, the determination of the County Council was, in the circumstances, an injudicious exercise of their powers and one which would cause public inconvenience. A record having been made up, the Sheriff-substitute appointed parties to debate on the "preliminary pleas," and thereafter pronounced an interlocutor repelling the pleas in law for the pursuers and "dismissing" the action. The pursuers appealed to the Sheriff, who recalled the foregoing interlocutor and appointed the case to be heard by himself. The County Council then brought a reduction of the Sheriff's interlocutor. The Court dismissed the action as incompetent, holding further that notwithstanding sec. 43 of the above Act, the Sheriff had acted within his powers in recalling the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor and appointing the cause to be heard before himself, in respect that the Sheriff-substitute had not disposed of the merits of the appeal from the determination of the County Council, and that the question of competency was in any event subject to appeal.

Sale of heritage—Warrandice.

The purchaser of a heritable subject, holding a disposition containing a clause of absolute warrandice, has no remedy under the warrandice clause other than a claim for indemnity for loss sustained through eviction. Welsh v. Russell, May 19, 1894, p. 769.

Defect in title—Right to cancel—Tender of valid title after action raised for implement.

A purchaser of heritage objected to the title tendered by the seller on the ground that it was defective. The seller having written a letter refusing to give any other title, the purchaser repudiated the contract. In the course of an action brought by the seller against the purchaser for implement, the pursuer admitted that the title previously tendered was defective, but tendered a valid title. Held that the purchaser had been justified in rescinding from the contract, and was entitled to absolvitor. Gillfillan v. Cadell & Grant, Dec. 12, 1893, p. 269.

Lease—Farm—Right to take peats from another part of estate—Sale of farm and of peat moss to different persons—Rent—Abatement—Retention—Act, 1449, cap. 18.

In 1880 the tenant of a farm renewed his lease of the farm, "all as possessed by him." For many years he and his predecessors in the farm had been in use to take peats from a moss on another part of the landlord's estate, a particular lair being appropriated to the farm. In 1887 the proprietor sold the moss, and subsequently sold the farm. Held in a question between the tenant and the purchaser of the farm that the tenant had under his lease a right to take peats from the moss, and that he was entitled to an abatement from his rent corresponding to the value of the right to take peats of which he had been deprived.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that the tenant's right to take peats from the moss was not protected by the Act 1449, cap. 18, so as to be good against singular successors in the ownership of the peat moss. Duncan v. Brooks, May 17, 1894, p. 760.

Assignment to bond and disposition in security—Unconditional offer and acceptance—Implement—Defect in bond.

The holders of a bond and disposition in security having advertised the security subjects for sale, the firm of A & B, who had a reversionary interest in the subjects, in consideration of the bondholders having agreed to withdraw the subjects from sale, bound themselves, by letter, personally to take an assignment of the bond and to pay the amount therein with interest. This was agreed to by letter, and the subjects were withdrawn from sale. Thereafter A & B refused to implement the contract, on the ground that they had discovered that the bond was not a valid security over the subjects quoad the interest, and that its validity in this respect was an implied condition of their obligation. In an action at the instance of the holders of the bond against A & B for implement of the contract, held that A & B were bound to take over the bond whether it was defective or not. Forbes v. Welsh & Forbes, March 8, 1894, p. 630.

Sale of moveables—Principal and Agent—Title to sue.

On 31st March Stewart, Brown, & Company sent the following sale-note to Biggart & Fulton:—"We have this day sold to you, on account of Stevenson & Company, Manila, 100 tons of sugar at £10, 17s. 3d. c. i. f. Liverpool . . . we to accept shippers' drafts at 3 m/s." Biggart & Fulton authorised Stewart, Brown, & Company to take delivery of and sell the sugar on arrival in Liverpool and to credit themselves with the proceeds against the price, and their outlay in taking delivery of the sugar and selling it. The proceeds of the sale in Liverpool were insufficient to meet the price, &c., and Stewart, Brown, & Company (together with Stevenson & Company) sued Biggart & Fulton for the difference. In defence Biggart & Fulton pleaded no title to sue, in respect that Stewart, Brown, & Company, as agents for a disclosed principal, had no title, and that Stevenson & Company had no title, as they had made no contract with Biggart & Fulton. On a proof it appeared that Stevenson & Company were in the custom of sending cargoes of sugar to this country for sale, but instead of breaking the cargoes into quantities to suit purchasers they disposed of them entire to brokers upon contracts which bore that the broker was "buyer" of the cargo at a certain sum per ton. The broker then disposed of the sugar in lots to the buyers whom he had secured at a somewhat increased rate per ton, he receiving the difference. Stewart, Brown, & Company held the cargo, of which the 100 tons in question was a part, on a contract in these terms, and disposed of it in this way to different purchasers. Held that Stewart, Brown, & Company, as agents for Biggart & Fulton in paying the price, taking delivery of the sugar, and reselling it at Liverpool, were entitled to recover the sum sued for.

SALE—Continued.

Question, whether the pursuers had a title to sue upon the sale-note of 31st March. Stewart, Brown, & Co. v. Biggart & Fulton, Dec. 13, 1893, p. 293.

Sale of moveables—Delivery—Possession—Marriage-contract—Conveyance to marriage-contract trustees retenta possessione.

6. In December 1883 M's estates were sequestrated, but before a trustee had been appointed a deed of arrangement was executed between M and his creditors and B. By this deed M assigned his furniture to B in consideration of payment of a sum exceeding its value by way of composition to the creditors. B thereafter assigned the furniture to the trustees under M's antenuptial marriage-contract for behoof of M's wife in liferent, and of the children of the marriage in fee, M's jus mariti being excluded. The furniture was allowed to remain in the house then occupied by M and his wife, which belonged to the trustees, and on the spouses removing to another house in 1884 the furniture was taken with them. In 1890 M sold the furniture to G, and G let the furniture on hire to M. The furniture remained with M and his wife. In an action by the marriage-contract trustees to have G interdicted from removing the furniture, held that the right to the furniture was in the trustees, in respect that since the date of the assignation in their favour M's wife had been in actual possession of it as liferentrix, and that the trustees had accordingly been in civil possession through her, and that G therefore had no title to it, and interdict granted. Mitchell's Trustees v. Gladstone, Feb. 27, 1894, p. 586.

Sale of moveables—Subsale—Factors Act, 1889, sec. 9—Factors (Scotland) Act, 1890.

7. Ainslie & Company sold certain casks of whisky in their bonded warehouse to Davis & Company, and gave them a delivery-order for the whisky on Anderson, the keeper of Ainslie & Company's bonded warehouse. Question whether Davis & Company were "mercantile agents in possession" of a document of title in the sense of the 9th section of the Factors Act, 1889. Browne & Co. v. Ainslie & Co., Nov. 28, 1893, p. 173.

Sale of moveables—Disconformity to contract—Timeous inspection by buyer—Loss of profit—Consequential damages.

8. In June 1891, W, a market gardener, ordered from a firm of seed-merchants 30 lbs of "Enfield market cabbage" seed, an early variety of cabbage. The invoice and the packet in which the seed was sent bore that the seed was of the variety ordered. W sowed the seed in his own garden, and retailed the plants to customers who ordered early cabbage plants, some in September 1891, but the bulk in March, April, and May 1892. In May 1892, when most of the plants were sold, W discovered that the crop was of a late variety, and ploughed down the remaining plants. In an action for damages against the seed-merchants it was proved that a skilled gardener could have discovered in September 1891 that the plants were disconform to contract. Held (1) that W was entitled to damages in respect that, owing to the defenders' breach of contract, his ground had been for a considerable time occupied with an unremunerative crop; but (2) that inasmuch as he had failed to discover, as he would have done had he made an inspection, the mistake in the variety of plant in September 1891, he was not entitled to damages on the grounds that claims of damages had been made against him by the buyers of the plants, and that he had lost business owing to the disappointment of his customers. Wilson v. Carmichael & Sons, March 20, 1894, p. 732.

Sale of moveables—Pactum illicitum—Weights and Measures Act, 1878, sec. 14, 19.

9. Held that a bargain to deliver 600 stones of hay, each stone to weigh 24 imperial pounds, was not void under the provisions of the Weights and Measures Act, the transaction being a sale by an imperial weight, namely, the pound. Lang v. Cameron, Jan. 10, 1894, p. 337.

Sale of moveables—Offer and acceptance—"This for reply by" a day named—Time.

10. An offer to buy certain goods bore, "This for reply by Monday, 6th inst." A letter accepting the offer was posted on the evening of Monday, the 6th, and did not reach the offerer until the next day. Held that the offer had been timeously accepted. Jacobsen, Sons, & Co. v. Underwood & Son, Limited, March 10, 1894, p. 654.

Sale of moveables—"Equal monthly quantities of 300 tons maximum."

11. On 5th March 1891 Waldie, a coalmaster, by sale-note contracted with Barr to sell 2500 tons of coal "in equal monthly quantities in lots of 300 tons maximum." A letter accompanying the sale-note stated "that if necessary you"—Barr—"are to extend the period of delivery somewhat." Held that the contract imported that the deliveries of coal were to be in monthly quantities as nearly as might be of 300 tons each, but never more. Barr v. Waldie, Dec. 8, 1893, p. 224.

Sale of moveables—Subsale—Intimation—Arrestment—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 3.

12. In January 1891 Ainslie & Company, of Leith, sold to Davis & Company, of London, twenty hogsheads of whisky, which were lying in Ainslie & Company's bonded warehouse at Leith, and gave Davis & Company a delivery-order for the whisky on Anderson, their warehouse-keeper, and Davis & Company sent this delivery-order to Anderson, intimating that they would grant delivery-orders on him for the whisky. Davis & Company paid the price of the whisky to Ainslie & Company. In April 1892 Ainslie & Company arrested the whisky, which had been sold to Browne & Company, but was still in Ainslie & Company's bonded warehouse, for a debt due to them by Davis & Company. In an action by Browne & Company against Ainslie & Company for delivery of the whisky, Ainslie & Company pleaded that they were entitled to arrest in virtue of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 3, the subsales not having been intimated to them within the meaning of the Act. A proof shewed that Browne & Company had neither intimated nor authorised anyone to intimate the subsale to Ainslie & Company, but Ainslie & Company knew that the subsale had taken place. Held that the arrestments were ineffectual in competition with Browne & Company. Browne & Co. v. Ainslie & Co., Nov. 28, 1893, p. 173.

Sale of ship—Title to sue—Acquisition of right and title after action raised.

13. A, the purchaser of a vessel from B, brought an action of damages in his own name and as assignee of B against C for injuries which had been done to the vessel prior to the date of the purchase. The summons was served on the 28th June 1893. On the 29th June the seller of the ship assigned to A all claims competent to him against C. Held (1) that at the date of the action A had no right to damages for injury done to the vessel prior to his purchase, and had no title to sue; and (2) that the subsequent assignation did not remedy the defect. Symington v. Campbell, Jan. 30, 1894, p. 434.

Sale of business—Resale for enhanced price—Subvendee—Reduction—Title to sue reduction of original contract.

14. An arrangement was made for the sale of a brewery by A to B at a price of £20,500 fixed on the basis of profits for the last two years as shewn by the books. The books were examined by an accountant employed by B, and the sale was completed. B sold the brewery to C for £28,500, which was fixed without reference to profits, and A, at B's request, conveyed the brewery to C. It was afterwards discovered that A's books contained false entries largely increasing the apparent profits, which had been made by his clerk without his knowledge. C in his own name and as B's assignee, and B, raised an action against A for reduction of the contract between A and B, and of the conveyance by A to C, C offering restitution in integrum. Held in aff. judgment of the First Division which assolizied A (1) that as C was not privy to the contract between A and B, he had no title to reduce it; (2) that as B had no interest in the subjects after the conveyance by A to C, he had no title to reduce the said contract. Edinburgh United Breweries, Limited, v. Molleson, March 9, 1894, H. L., p. 10.

Sale of business—Agreement to sell business on condition of buyer being satisfied as to profits after examination of the books.

15. An agreement for the sale of a brewery business at a certain price set out that the arrangement proceeded upon the basis that the profits during the two preceding years amounted to a certain sum upon an average, and that "in the event of it being ascertained that this is not the fact the arrangement shall be at an end"; and further bore, that B, the purchaser, "with the view of verifying the amount of the profits for the said two years, shall immediately, upon delivery hereof, be entitled to have the books," &c., connected with the business, examined by an accountant. The balance-sheets and books were examined by accountants employed by the buyer, and thereafter the contract of sale was completed. The buyer thereafter agreed to assign his rights as purchaser to a company, and at his request the original seller conveyed the brewery to the company. In an action brought by the company as B's assignee, and with his concurrence, against the original seller for reduction of the sale to B, on the ground that it had been ascertained that the amount of the profits set forth as the basis of the price was not the true amount of profits, and that in terms of the contract the sale fell to be reduced, held that the condition as to the amount of profits lapsed on the completion of the sale. Edinburgh United Breweries, Limited, v. Molleson, March 9, 1894, H. L., p. 10.

Sale of moveables—Construction.

16. Sale of 3000 tons of coal to be delivered "over next four months" in "average" or "about equal" monthly quantities. Ireland v. Merryton Coal Co., July 13, 1894, p. 989.

1. Action dismissed as irrelevant, in respect that the pursuer had no right to the Government grant in virtue of his office as an "old" teacher, and had stated no relevant case of a specific contract with the school board giving him a right thereto. *M'Vicar v. Jurisdiction—Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, secs. 26 and 30.

2. Held that it is ultra vires of a Sheriff to consider the question of jurisdiction in a petition for sequestration until the diet to which the debtor is cited, under sec. 26 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, to shew cause why sequestration should not be awarded. *Hope v. Interlocutor—Findings in fact—Act of Sederunt, 15th February 1851.

4. An interlocutor of a Sheriff disposing of a case in which a proof had been led contained no findings in fact as required by the Act of Sederunt, 15th February 1851. The Court remitted to the Sheriff to recall the interlocutor, and pronounce one in the form prescribed by the Act of Sederunt. Mackay v. Mackenzie, June 12, 1894, p. 894.

Appeal—Competency—Statutory declaration of finality—Competency of appeal from Sheriff-substitute to Sheriff—Reduction of Sheriff's interlocutor—Road—County Council—Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, secs. 3, 42, and 43.

5. A County Council having determined that a particular road should cease to be a highway, three ratepayers appealed to the Sheriff, pleading (1) that it was incompetent for the County Council to declare that the road should cease to be a highway in respect that it was part of a road which extended beyond the confines of the county; and (2) that if competent, the determination of the County Council was, in the circumstances, an injudicious exercise of their powers and one which would cause public inconvenience. A record having been made up, the Sheriff-substitute appointed parties to debate on the "preliminary pleas," and thereafter pronounced an interlocutor repelling the pleas in law for the pursuers and "dismissing" the action. The pursuers appealed to the Sheriff, who recalled the foregoing interlocutor and appointed the case to be heard by himself. The County Council then brought a reduction of the Sheriff's interlocutor. The Court dismissed the action as incompetent, holding further that notwithstanding sec. 43 of the above Act the Sheriff had acted within his powers in recalling the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor and appointing the cause to be heard before himself, the Sheriff-substitute not having disposed of the merits of the appeal from the determination of the County Council, and that the question of competency was in any event subject to appeal. County Council of Roxburgh v. Dalrymple's Trustees, July 19, 1894, p. 1063.

Appeal—Competency—Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 61.

Appeal—Competency—Arbitration—Glasgow District Subway Act, 1890, sec. 56.

7. Under a private Act of Parliament all differences were to be referred to an arbiter appointed "by the Sheriff of the county of Lanark." Held that in SHIPPING LAW. Bill of lading—Proof—Onus.

1. Where the quantity of goods delivered by a vessel at the port of discharge is less than that stated in the bill of lading the onus of proving that the quantity referred to in the bill of lading was not in fact shipped lies upon the owner of the vessel. Horsley v. J. & A. D. Grimond, Jan. 23, 1894, p. 410.

Bill of lading—Right in security.

2. Bill of lading handed over in security of loan—Handing of bill of lading to borrowers as agents for lenders to obtain delivery of goods and to sell for behoof of lenders. Held that by handing over the bill of lading the lenders had lost their real security. North-Western Bank, Limited, v. Poynter, Son, & Macdonald, Feb. 2, 1894, p. 513.

Charter-party—Charterer's right to freight earned for deck cargo.

3. Where a charter-party binds the shipowners to carry a full and complete cargo for a lump sum, the charterer is not entitled to any freight which the ship may earn by goods stored on deck. Wills & Co. v. Burrell & Son, Feb. 2, 1894, p. 527.

Shipbroker—Agent and Principal—Commission.

4. Circumstances in which it was held that a shipbroker who had first introduced to a firm of shipbuilders the name of a person who afterwards bought a ship from them was not entitled to any commission, the introduction having in no way contributed to bring about the sale. Jacobs & Co. v. McMillan & Son, Limited, March 8, 1894, p. 623.

Collision—Regulations for preventing collisions at sea under Order of Council, 11th August 1884, articles 15, 18, 19, and 21.

5. The steamships "Thorsa" and "Otto" were approaching each other end-on, or nearly so, in daylight in the Sound. When they were a mile apart the "Thorsa" signalled in manner provided by the 19th article of the Regulations for preventing collisions at sea of 1884, that she was (in terms of article 15 of these Regulations) about to alter her course to starboard to pass the "Otto" on the port side, and at the same time she put her helm to port, and brought her head a point, or nearly a point, to starboard. The "Otto" heard, but disregarded the signal, and kept her course. When the ships were within half a mile, the "Thorsa" repeated the signal, and again ported her helm. The "Otto" immediately thereafter starboarded her helm, bringing her head to port, and shaped a course across the bows of the "Thorsa." The "Thorsa" immediately stopped and reversed her engines, but a collision took place, and the "Otto" sank. In cross actions by the owners of the vessels the owners of the "Otto," while admitting that their vessel had been in fault, maintained that the "Thorsa" had also been in fault, in respect that she did not stop and reverse her engines when the risk of collision first became apparent. Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that no fault was attributable to the "Thorsa," in respect (1) that it was proved that at her second porting the "Thorsa" had done enough to determine the risk of collision if the "Otto" had kept her course; and (2) that she had complied with article 18, as she had stopped and reversed as soon as it became apparent that it was "necessary" so to do, i.e., when the "Otto" changed her course so as to cross the bows of the "Thorsa." Wilson, Sons, & Co. v. Currie, March 13, 1894, H. L., p. 17.

Reparation—Title to sue—Acquisition of right and title after action raised.

6. A, the purchaser of a vessel from B, brought an action of damages in his own name and as assignee of B against C for injuries which had been done to the vessel prior to the date of the purchase. The summons was served on the 28th June 1893. On the 29th June the seller of the ship assigned to A all claims competent to him against C. Held (1) that at the date of the action A had no right to damages for injury done to the vessel prior to his purchase, and had no title to sue; and (2) that the subsequent assignation did not remedy the defect. Symington v. Campbell, Jan. 30, 1894, p. 434.

Reparation—Danger to ship at quay—Obstruction by vessel lying outside and parallel—Right to cut mooring ropes of outside vessel to escape danger.

7. While the s.s. "Dunlossit" was lying at a quay the s.s. "Easdale" came in, in the evening, took up her position outside and close to the "Dunlossit," and moored herself to the shore by ropes crossing the stem and stern of the "Dunlossit." A gale rose during the night, and the position of both vessels became perilous. During the night the master of the "Dunlossit" repeatedly asked the master of the "Easdale" to move, so that the "Dunlossit" might escape, but the master of the "Easdale" did not do so. In the morning the master of the "Dunlossit," after giving warning of his intention, cut the mooring ropes of the "Easdale" and steamed away. The "Easdale" was then driven ashore by the wind and damaged. In an action of damages at the instance of the owner of the "Easdale" against the owners of the "Dunlossit," held that the cutting of the ropes was prima facie an illegal act, and that the defenders had failed to justify it, and were therefore liable in damages for the consequences of the act. Currie v. Allan, July 17, 1894, p. 1004.

STATUTE. Private Act—Railway.

1. Observations on the construction of private Acts of Parliament amalgamating railway companies, as affecting the rights of companies not parties to the Act. Aberdeen Joint Station Committee v. Great North of Scotland Railway Company, Nov. 14, 1894, H. L., p. 48.

Construction of statute—Title to sue—Declarator.

2. The magistrates of a police burgh having intimated that they claimed, under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, to be the licensing authority for the sale of excisable liquors within the burgh, a publican holding a licence for premises in the burgh, which had been granted by the county Justices, brought an action for declarator that the licensing jurisdiction within the burgh had not been transferred from the county Justices to the burgh magistrates, and for interdict against the magistrates acting as the licensing authority. Held that the pursuer had a title to sue. Tennent v. Magistrates of Partick, March 20, 1894, p. 735.

Rules made in virtue of statute—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Acts, 1883 and 1888.

3. Opinion that rules made by the Board of Trade bearing to be made in virtue of the above Act were intra vires of the Board, and that it was not competent for a Court of law to entertain any question as to the validity of these rules. Institute of Patent-Agents v. Lockwood, June 11, 1894, H. L., p. 61.

SUCCESSION. "Next of kin."

1. Advertisement in newspaper that £100 would in the event of the death through accident of subscriber to paper, be paid to the person whom the proprietors of the paper "may decide to be the next of kin" of such subscriber. Law v. George Newnes, Limited, July 17, 1894, p. 1027.
2. Payment of interest of deceased member of provident society to the persons who appear to a majority of the committee of the society to be entitled by law to receive the same. Symington's Executor v. Galashiels Co-operative Store Co., Limited, Jan. 13, 1894, p. 371.
3. Vesting in next of kin taking ab intestato. Ross' Trustees, July 14, 1894, p. 995.

Aliment—Maintenance of lunatic widow.

4. A husband died intestate and childless, survived by his widow, who was of unsound mind, and was confined in a lunatic asylum. She had no means of subsistence other than her right to a half of her husband's estate, which amounted to £200. In a special case between her curator bonis and the deceased's next of kin, held that the maintenance of the widow was not a burden on the husband's estate, and that the next of kin were entitled to immediate payment of one-half thereof. Howard's Executor v. Howard's Curator Bonis, May 25, 1894, p. 787.

Crofter—Succession—Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, sec. 16.

Jus mariti—Marriage-contract.

6. By antenuptial marriage-contract executed in 1855 a wife conveyed the whole funds payable to her under her father's settlement to trustees for the purpose, inter alia, that the revenue of £5000 (being the portion of the funds available at the date of the contract) should be paid to herself exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of her husband, the clear revenue of the remainder to be held for the joint behoof of the spouses and paid to them on their joint receipt. The husband expressly renounced his jus mariti and right of administration, in so far as the capital of the whole funds and the revenue of the £5000 were concerned, but the deed was silent as to the husband's rights with respect to the revenue of the remainder of the funds. Held that the husband's jus mariti and right of administration did not affect funds conveyed to the trustees by the antenuptial contract of marriage or the revenue thereof. Bruce's Trustees v. Bruce's Trustee, Feb. 27, 1894, p. 593.

Jus relictæ—Marriage-contract—Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, secs. 6 and 8.

7. Claim by surviving husband to one-half of his wife's moveable estate repelled on the ground that it was inconsistent with the provisions of the marriage-contract between him and his wife. Buntine v. Buntine's Trustees, March 16, 1894, p. 714.

Legitim.

8. Amount of legitim fund—Father twice married—Whether legitim of children of first marriage diminished by provisions to children under antenuptial contract of second marriage. Bishop's Trustees v. Bishop, March 17, 1894, p. 728.

Legitim—Interest.

9. Held that interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum was due upon a child's legitim from the date of the father's death, although the funds in the hands of the father's testamentary trustees had been earning only about 2 per cent. Bishop's Trustees v. Bishop, March 17, 1894, p. 728.

Testament—Writ—Unsubscribed holograph writing underneath subscribed holograph settlement.

10. A holograph writing, occurring below the subscription to a holograph trust-settlement, and containing bequests of specific articles, held to be effectual, as part of the trust-settlement, although not itself subscribed. Burnie's Trustee v. Lawrie, July 17, 1894, p. 1015.

Testament—Construction—Revocation—Marriage-contract—Alimentary life-rent—Power of spouses jointly to recall alimentary life-rent to widow—Trust—Denuding.

11. By antenuptial contract of marriage the husband on his part conveyed his whole means and estate to trustees for payment to himself during his life, and after his death to his wife, should she survive him, of the free annual income thereof, "for the life-rent and alimentary use alienably of them and the survivor of them, declaring that the same shall not be affectable by the debts or deeds of either of them, or the diligence of their creditors." Then followed provisions to the effect that in the event of there being no children of the marriage the fee of the husband's estate should be reconveyed to him, or made over to his heirs and assignees on the death of the wife. The marriage was dissolved, without issue, by the death of the husband, who left a will, by which he bequeathed "all my real and personal estate, including any property over which I have power of appointment, to my dear wife absolutely," appointed her his sole executor, and revoked "all former wills and testamentary dispositions." The widow having called on the trustee under the marriage-contract trust to denude of the trust-estate in her favour, held that, on a sound construction of the husband's will, it was not his intention to discharge his estate of the alimentary liferent in his widow's favour, and consequently that the trustee was not entitled to denude of the trust-estate.

Question, whether it was in the power of the husband, with the consent of his wife, to revoke the alimentary liferent. Elliott's Trustee v. Elliott, July 13, 1894, p. 975.

Testament—Construction—Accretion of liferent.

12. In her trust-settlement a testator appointed her trustees to pay over the yearly interest of the residue of her estate to her three brothers, Charles, George, and Stuart, equally among them, and to the survivors and survivor of them, and at the death of the survivor to divide the residue among three of her nieces. In a codicil, upon the narrative that George, one of the brothers, had died since the date of the settlement, she provided,— "I hereby recall the bequest made by me therein to George of a share of the residue of my estate, being one-third thereof, and ordain my trustees to pay over the said share which would have fallen to him had he not so predeceased me to his widow." The testatrix died in 1890, and her brother Stuart died in 1893. In an action raised by George's widow against the trustees, held (assuming that by share of residue the testator meant share of income of residue) that the pursuer was entitled not only to the third share of income, but also to one half of Stuart's share to which under the settlement her husband would have been entitled. Burnett v. Burnett's Trustees, July 18, 1894, p. 1040.

Testament—Construction—"Residue."

13. The presumption is that the word "residue" occurring in a testamentary writing carries the residue of the testator's whole estates and not merely the balance of a particular fund. Millar v. Morrison, June 21, 1894, p. 921.

Testament—Construction—"Survivor."

14. "Survivor" held to be equivalent to "other." Paterson's Trustees v. Brand, Dec. 9, 1893, p. 253.

15. Held contra. Monteith v. Belfrage, March 7, 1894, p. 615.

Testament—Construction—Rent of lands to "form part of" annuity—Additional or in security merely.

16. A testator by his trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees to pay an annuity of £500 to his widow, with power to her to bequeath the amount of the annuity to any one or more of the children she might choose, and failing her exercising this power, the sum retained to meet the annuity was to be divided among the children equally. The estate beyond what was retained to meet the annuity was to be realised and divided among the children equally. By holograph codicil the testator directed that the free rental of certain heritage should "form part of the annuity bequeathed to my wife during her life . . . after the death of my wife the free rental to be divided equally among my children." Held that the rental of the heritage was not intended to be given in addition to the £500 annuity already bequeathed, but merely that the heritage was to be part of the estate retained to meet the annuity. Chivas' Trustees v. Chivas, Oct. 17, 1893, p. 1.

Testament—Construction—Implication—Resignation of trustees—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867.

17. A trust-disposition and settlement, which conferred no express power on the trustees to resign, contained a clause, declaring that upon any of the trustees resigning office and accounting for their intrusions, the remaining trustees should be bound to discharge them of their office. Held that the trustees had power to resign under the deed, and a petition for authority to resign refused as unnecessary. Bunten v. Muir, Jan. 13, 1894, p. 370.

Faculties and powers—Power to appoint “under conditions”—Appointment in part ultra vires.

18. By antenuptial marriage-contract trustees were directed after the death of the survivor of the spouses “to pay over or assign” certain funds to the child or children of the marriage “in such proportions and at such times and under such conditions” as the survivor of the spouses should appoint. The spouses were survived by three children of the marriage. The surviving spouse in his trust-disposition and settlement, professing to exercise the power of appointment, directed his trustees to “lay out and invest the third part or share falling to his daughter F.” in their own names, and to pay over the annual proceeds to F. during her life, and “in the event of her being married, and her husband surviving her,” to pay the annual proceeds to him, and upon the death of the longest liver of F. and her husband, then to hold the funds for behoof of F.’s children. Failing children of F., the trustees were directed at the death of the survivor of F. and her husband to pay the funds “to such persons and in such manner” as F. should direct. In a question between the trustees and F. (who was seventy-five years of age and unmarried), F. contended that the power had been invalidly exercised. Held (1) that the appointment was not invalid because it restricted F.’s right to a liferent, with a power to test; and (2) that although the provisions in favour of F.’s husband and children were ultra vires and ineffectual, their invalidity did not affect the gift of the power of disposal in the event of F. having no children. Wright’s Trustees v. Wright, Feb. 20, 1894, p. 568.

Faculties and powers—Liferent with power of testing—Exercise of power.

19. A son who was entitled under his father’s settlement to the fee of part of his father’s estate and to the liferent of another part with a power of testing thereon, left a will in which, after bequeathing certain legacies, he left the residue of his real and personal estate to his brothers. Held that the will was to be construed as embracing the share of his father’s estate of which he had power to dispose by will. Clark’s Trustees v. Clark’s Executors, Feb. 16, 1894, p. 546.

Power of appointment—Exercise of—Marriage-contract—Construction.

20. Terms of trust-settlement which were held to be an effectual exercise of a power of appointment in an antenuptial marriage-contract. Donaldson’s Trustee v. Donaldson, July 17, 1894, p. 1025.

Liferent or fee—Intestacy.

21. A testator by his settlement “willed and disposed of” his whole property in favour of his two surviving daughters nominatim “during their lifetime, share and share alike,” and appointed two persons to be trustees “to see the provisions of this my will carried into effect.” The settlement did not dispose of the fee of his estate per expressum. The testator was survived by the two daughters named in the will, and by a grandchild, the daughter of a deceased daughter. His wife predeceased him. In a competition between (1) the two surviving daughters, and (2) the grandchild, held that the settlement conferred a liferent only of one-half the estate on each of the surviving daughters, and that as each liferent terminated, the half of the fee liferented fell to be disposed of as intestate succession of the testator. Spink’s Executors v. Simpson, Feb. 16, 1894, p. 551.

Trust—Charitable trust—Uncertainty.

22. Held that a direction to trustees to pay and apply the residue of the testator’s estate “to such useful, benevolent, and charitable institutions” as the trustees in their discretion might think proper, was not void from uncertainty. Cobb v. Cobb's Trustees, March 9, 1894, p. 638.

Precatory bequests—Bequest to A "for the benefit of herself and of B."

23. Held that under a bequest "to A for the benefit of herself and of her sister B," each sister had a vested beneficial right in fee to one-half of the bequest, but that A was bound to retain B's share during their joint lives as trustee for her. Macpherson v. Macpherson's Curator Bonis, Jan. 17, 1894, p. 386.

Conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit.

24. A mother in her settlement bequeathed one-third of her silver-plate to her daughter M, and small keepsakes to M's daughters, and by a subsequent clause bequeathed to each of her children an equal share of residue. By a codicil the testator, on the narrative of M's death, revoked the bequest of silver-plate, and directed it to be divided among the testator's family. In a question between M's children and the testator's heirs in mobilibus, held that the conditio si sine liberis was to be implied in the settlement with regard to the bequest of residue, and was not displaced by the codicil. Forrester's Trustees v. Forrester, July 12, 1894, p. 971.

Conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit.

25. The presumption is that a settlement which makes no provision for children nascituri is revoked on the birth of a child to the testator after the date of the settlement, although he had children at its date. Elder's Trustees v. Elder, March 16, 1894, p. 704.

Heritable and Moveable—Conversion.

26. Held (1) that the exercise of a power to sell the heritage was indispensable to the due execution of the trust, and therefore (2) that the whole of the share of a beneficiary who had not received it was moveable quoad her succession, and fell to her heirs in mobilibus. Playfair's Trustees v. Playfair, June 1, 1894, p. 836.

Option to take over heritable subjects at specified price—Enhancement of value after date of settlement—Recompense—Mora.

27. Circumstances in which it was held (1) that three sons who under their father's settlement had the option of taking over certain business premises had not lost their right to exercise the option by delay, and (2) that they were entitled to have the subjects conveyed to them on the conditions set forth in the settlement, without compensating the general estate for the sums expended on them since the testator's death. Fraser's Trustees v. Fraser, May 25, 1894, p. 790.

Trust—Testamentary annuity to widow less Government annuity and increase in latter after death of testator—Bona fide percepta et consumpta.

28. A husband who predeceased his wife, by a trust-disposition and settlement, inter alia, directed his trustees to pay to his widow an annuity of £300 "in addition to what she is entitled to under" the contract of marriage, "my intention being that the said" widow "shall have a free annuity of £600 under the said marriage-contract and these presents, any annuity she may receive from the Bombay Civil Fund being imputed to account thereof"; under the declaration that in the event of his widow "from any cause losing or not receiving from the Bombay Civil Fund the usual annuity of Indian civil servants, she shall only be entitled to a free annuity of £500 from my own proper funds, to which sum her annuity under said marriage-contract and these presents shall in that event be restricted." The amount of the annuity payable from the Bombay Civil Fund to the widow at her husband's death in 1876 was £300, and she accordingly received £300 a-year more from her husband's testamentary trustees. In 1882 the Bombay Civil Fund annuity was by Act of Parliament increased by a pension of £60 a-year. The husband's representatives continued to pay to the widow an additional £300 a-year until 1894, when the question arose whether the additional sum ought to be £240 a-year only in respect that she was receiving the additional pension of £60 a-year. A special case was presented by the widow and her husband's representatives, in which it was admitted that they had paid and she had received the full £300 a-year from her husband's estates in bona fide ignorance of any doubt as to her right to do so. Held (1) that from the time the widow became entitled to the additional annuity of £60 she was only entitled to receive an annuity of £240 from her husband's estate, but (2) that she was not bound to repay the over-payments. Hunter's Trustees v. Hunter, July 6, 1894, p. 949.

Satisfaction of legacy by advances—Interest.

29. A trustor bequeathed a share of residue to his daughters in liferent only and their children in fee, but declaring "that all advances which I have made, or may hereafter make, to my respective sons-in-law, shall be deducted from the respective shares" liferented by his daughters. The trustor acceded to a trust-deed for creditors granted by one of his sons-in-law, to whom he had made advances, took payment of dividends, and granted receipts therefor, which bore that he accepted the dividends in terms of the trust-disposition, and discharged his son-in-law. In a special case held that the balance of the father's advances, which had not been repaid to him, but without interest, fell, as at the date of the father's death, to be imputed as a payment to account of the share of residue falling to the daughter's children. Smith's Trustees v. Sellar, March 9, 1894, p. 633.

Vesting—Direction to trustees to retain—Repugnancy—Revocation.

30. Terms of trust-disposition and codicil upon a construction of which held (1) that as under the trust-disposition by itself the provisions to the daughters vested a morte testatoris, the codicil was not to be construed as altering the period of vesting, and (2) that the daughters were entitled to immediate payment of their provisions, directions to the trustees to retain, in the codicil, being void from repugnancy. Wilkie's Trustees v. Wight's Trustees, Nov. 30, 1893, p. 199.

Vesting—Express clause of vesting—Testament—Construction—Repugnancy.

31. A testator, by his trust-disposition and settlement, directed his trustees, after the death of the survivor of himself and his wife, to "set apart as a debt the sum which they shall judge necessary" for the maintenance and education of such of his children as should then be in minority until they should reach majority, "and the trustees shall pay over and divide the free proceeds of my moveable or personal estate and arrears or accumulations, if any, of the whole income of the trust-estate, to and among, and shall dispose, assign, and convey my whole heritable and real estate to and in favour of" his children, "equally share and share alike, and the survivors and survivor equally, and that at the term of Whitsunday or Martinmas immediately following the death of the survivor of my said wife and me, or the majority of my youngest child, whichever of these events shall last happen, on the following conditions: the share of the premises of each child shall be a vested right at majority, though not payable till the youngest child reach majority; if any of my said children die before the said period of division leaving lawful issue, the latter shall succeed equally to the share of their parent." In a competition between the trustee of the testator's eldest son, who survived his father and attained majority, but predeceased his mother, and the only child of the eldest son, held that on a sound construction of the trust-disposition and settlement, the shares of the testator's children vested in them as they respectively attained majority, although their mother might then be alive. Carruthers's Trustee v. Eeles, Feb. 1, 1894, p. 492.

Vesting—Repugnancy.

32. A testator directed his trustees, after payment of an alimentary liferent of the residue of his estate to his brother, Joseph Ritchie, to "hold and apply" one-half of the residue "for the uses and behoof of Alexander Ritchie, son of Joseph Ritchie, and of any other child or children that may yet be procreated of his marriage, equally among them if more than one, and if only one child should be left, then for the sole use and behoof of such child, and that in such sums, at such times, and in such manner as my trustees shall think best, and of which they shall be the sole judges." Joseph Ritchie survived his brother, the testator, and as one of his brother's two next of kin was entitled to one-half of such part of his brother's estate as might be undisposed of. Joseph Ritchie died leaving a will by which he bequeathed the fee of his whole estates to his only son Alexander. Alexander having called on his grandfather's trustees to denude of one-half of the trust-estates in his favour, held that the fee of one-half of the residue of his grandfather's estate having vested in Alexander Ritchie either under his grandfather's will or ab intestato, the trustees were bound to denude in his favour. Ritchie's Trustees v. Ritchie, March 16, 1894, p. 679.

Vesting—Effect of widow's repudiation of testamentary annuity.

33. Held (dub. Lord Young) that a widow's repudiation of her husband's settlement did not accelerate the period of vesting of the residue, and consequently that the trustees were not entitled under the residue clause to pay over either the capital or the income until the death or the second marriage of the widow. Ross's Trustees v. Ross, June 28, 1894, p. 927.

Vesting—No gift except in direction to convey.

34. A testator by trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees to give to his wife the liferent of his whole estates, and then directed them, as soon as convenient after her death, to convey a specific heritable property to his daughter M, "but in the event of her marrying and having no issue alive at the time of her death, the same shall revert to and belong to my surviving children, share and share alike." The truster was survived by his wife, by his daughter M, and by other children. Held that no fee vested in M at the testator's death. Groat v. Stewart's Trustees, July 7, 1894, p. 961.

Vesting—Substitution.

35. A testator by holograph settlement left the liferent of his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to his widow. He then disposed of the fee of his estates, and, inter alia, provided, "I leave to my nephew J. F. W. my estate of B, but I wish it expressly understood that in the event of my said nephew dying without leaving any lawful heir-male of his body, then and in that event my said lands of B are to revert back to my nephew J. H." J. F. W. survived the testator, but predeceased the testator's widow unmarried, and was survived by J. H. J. F. W. left a general trust-disposition and settlement of his whole estates, heritable and moveable. In a question between J. F. W.'s trustees and J. H., held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the fee of the lands of B vested in J. F. W. at the testator's death, subject to a simple substitution in favour of J. H., in the event of J. F. W. dying without leaving an heir-male of his body, and that the substitution had been evacuated by J. F. W.'s general disposition. Hamilton v. Ritchie, June 4, 1894, H. L., p. 35.

Vesting—Conditional institution—Destination over—Heritage—Substitution.

36. By general disposition and settlement A disposed a share of her heritable and moveable estate to B in liferent allennarly, and to the heirs of B's body in fee, whom failing, to C, and the heirs of his body in fee. C survived the testator, and was survived by B, the liferentrix, who died unmarried. C left an heir of his body who survived the liferentrix. Held that no fee had vested in C, as the heir of his body was a conditional institute. Turner v. Gaw, Feb. 20, 1894, p. 563.

Vesting—Payment postponed till death of liferenter without children.

37. A truster by his trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees to hold a fund for behoof of his daughter F., and of any husband she might marry who should survive her in liferent, and on the death of the survivor, for behoof of their children. Failing children of F., then the trustees were directed at the death of F., or of her husband, if he survived her, to pay the fund to the children of the truster's son W. if any then existing, and failing such children, to pay one half of the fund to W. himself or his next of kin. W. survived the truster, and died unmarried. At the date of his death F. was his sole next of kin. In a question between F. (who was unmarried, and seventy-five years of age) and the trustees, F. contended that one half of the fund had vested in her subject to defeasance in the event of her having children. Held that vesting was postponed until the death of F. Wright's Trustees v. Wright, Feb. 20, 1894, p. 568.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL. Composition—Relief—Implied entry—Entail—Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, sec. 4.

1. An institute under a deed of entail obtained an implied entry with the superior by the Conveyancing Act, 1874, and not being an heir aliouqui successurus became liable in composition. The superior discharged his claim on payment of relief-duty. On the next heir of entail—who was not heir of line—obtaining an implied entry the superior claimed composition. Held that the vassal being the heir of investiture was only liable in relief-duty. Lord Advocate v. Moray, Feb. 16, 1894, p. 553.

Feu-charter—Construction—Servitude—Road.

2. In 1806 a proprietor feued to A a piece of ground bounded on the south by a road, and on the west by another feu granted to B. At the northern extremity of A's feu, 140 feet from the road, was a well, and his charter contained this clause,—“But reserving always to our said feuars and their tenants and servants free entry and issue to and from the said well by a road or passage of 6 feet wide and at least 8 feet high, to be left out upon the west end of the piece of ground hereby disposed.” B had built a house fronting the road, with its eastern gable resting upon but not beyond the verge of his feu, with a boundary wall in continuation to the back, also just within his feu. A, in building his house, instead of building a western gable, made use of B's gable, leaving a passage below the house 6 feet wide close to B's gable. Behind the house a passage to the well 6 feet wide was left unbuilt on close to B's boundary. In 1866 B's successors made openings in their boundary wall, which were used as an access to the passage. In 1892 A's successor in his feu brought an action against B's successor for declarator that he was entitled to build a wall on the extreme west of his feu, the effect of building such a wall being that the passage would require to be moved eastward to an extent equal to the breadth of the proposed wall, and that B's successor would not have access to the passage through the doors in his wall. Held that, on a sound construction of his titles, the pursuer was entitled to decree. Blair v. Strachan, March 14, 1894, p. 661.

Restrictions on building—Feu-charter—Buildings similar in style and quality.

3. A feu-disposition contained a provision that the dwelling-houses to be erected on the feu by the feuar should be “similar in style and quality” to the tenements already erected by the superior in the same street in which the feu subjects were situated. The vassal erected a tenement containing dwelling-houses consisting of three or two rooms each. The tenements erected by the superior consisted of houses containing four or three rooms each. Externally the tenements were similar. Held that the tenement erected by the vassal was not in contravention of the stipulations of the feu-disposition. Middleton v. Leslie, May 23, 1894, p. 781.

SUSPENSION. See *Bill of Exchange.*TEINDS. Bona fide perception and consumption—Belief that teinds exhausted.

In an action at the instance of a proprietor of teinds against the proprietor of the lands for arrears of surplus teinds, the defender admitted that the pursuer was the proprietor of the teinds, but pleaded bona fide consumption, averring that he had regularly paid his proportion of the minister's stipend in the belief that the teind was thereby exhausted. Held that the defenders' statements were not relevant to support the plea of bona fide consumption. Macrae v. Assets Co., Limited, July 20, 1894, p. 1080.

TIME. See Justiciary Cases, 17, 18—Reparation, 28—Sale, 10.

TITLE TO SUE. Lease—Heir—Executor—Rent legally due prior to heir's succession, but conventionally payable thereafter—Removing.

1. Where a tenant is bound to pay rent at a certain term, the landlord then in possession is entitled to enforce the obligation, notwithstanding that he may be liable to account for the rent recovered to the representatives of his predecessor. Lennox v. Reid, Nov. 14, 1893, p. 77.

Right in security—Reparation—Injury to property—Evidence that a disposition ex facie absolute was really in security.

2. Held that it had been proved that a disposition ex facie absolute was in security merely, and that as the disponees had not been divested of the radical right to the subjects he had a good title to sue an action for damages for injury to the subjects. M'Bride v. Caledonian Railway Co., March 7, 1894, p. 620.

Acquisition of right and title after action raised.

3. A, the purchaser of a vessel from B, brought an action of damages in his own name and as assignee of B against C for injuries which had been done to the vessel prior to the date of the purchase. The summons was served on 28th June 1893. On the 29th June the seller of the ship assigned to A all claims competent to him against C. Held (1) that at the date of the action A had no right to damages for injury done to the vessel prior to his purchase, and had no title to sue; and (2) that the subsequent assignation did not remedy the defect. Symington v. Campbell, Jan. 30, 1894, p. 434.

Company—Agent and Principal—Contract by agent for intended company.

4. In an action of damages at the instance of a limited company, registered on 29th July 1890, the pursuers averred that, on 11th July 1890, D, as agent for the company, entered into a contract with the defenders for the supply by the latter of certain pieces of machinery, and that the machinery supplied was defective, and had caused great loss to the company. Held that the company had not set forth a title to sue, as D could not have acted as its agent before it was in existence. Tinnevelley Sugar Refining Co., Limited, v. Mirrlees, Watson, & Yaryan Co., Limited, July 17, 1894, p. 1009.

Declarator—Construction of statute.

5. The magistrates of a police burgh having intimated that they claimed, under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, to be the licensing authority for the sale of exciseable liquors within the burgh, a publican holding a licence for premises in the burgh, which had been granted by the county Justices, brought an action for declarator that the licensing jurisdiction within the burgh had not been transferred from the county Justices to the burgh magistrates, and for interdict against the magistrates acting as the licensing authority. Held that the pursuer had a title to sue. Tennent v. Magistrates of Partick, March 20, 1894, p. 735.

Sale—Resale for enhanced price—Subvendee—Reduction—Title to sue reduction of original contract.

6. C in his own name and as B's assignee, and B, raised an action against A for reduction of contract between A and B, and of a conveyance following thereon by A to C, C offering restitution in integrum.

Held, in aff. judgment of the First Division which assailed A, (1) that as C was not privy to the contract between A and B, he had no title to reduce it; (2) that as B had no interest in the subjects after the conveyance by A to C, he had no title to reduce the said contract. Edinburgh United Breweries, Limited, v. Molleson, March 9, 1894, H. L., p. 10.

TRAMWAY. Sale to Local Authority—Undertaking—Price—Rental value—Tramways Act, 1870, sec. 43.

In an action for the reduction of an award by a referee under this provision, held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that having regard to the fact that the tramway company could not assign the right to use the tramways, the "then value" of the tramway meant the then value of the tramway lines, and that in ascertaining the value the basis of the calculation should be the sum which would be required to construct the lines less a sum for depreciation. Edinburgh Street Tramways Co. v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, July 30, 1894, H. L., p. 78.

TRANSACTION. Church—Churchyard—Heritors—Ultra vires.

1. Held that it is within the powers of the heritors of a parish to compromise questions regarding the extent of the churchyard, arising with a contentious proprietor, subject to the control of the Court at the instance of anyone having a legitimate interest. Fraser v. Turner, Dec. 13, 1893, p. 278.
Compromise of action by joint minute—Proof—Oral modification of written contract.

2. Held that it was incompetent to prove by parole evidence an alleged verbal agreement to vary the terms on which an action had been compromised in a joint minute signed by counsel. Hamilton & Baird v. Lewis, Nov. 15, 1893, p. 120.

TRESPASS. See Justiciary Cases, 19—Reparation, 14.

TRUST. Constitution of trust—Provision for wife or wife trustee for husband.

1. *By antenuptial bond of annuity A provided to his wife an annuity of £1000 per annum, "to be applied by her towards the expenses of my household and establishment, and that during all the days of my life, . . . moreover, I do hereby renounce and discharge my jus mariti and right of administration of and in relation to" his wife's estate, "including the foresaid annuity payable to her during my lifetime, declaring that the same shall be and remain a separate estate in her person, free of any right or claim on my part whatsoever." Some years after the marriage A executed a trust-disposition of his whole estate for behoof of creditors. Held that the annuity fell to be applied by the wife for her husband's behoof, and that therefore the bond was ineffectual in a question with his creditors. Elliott v. Elliott's Trustee, July 7, 1894, p. 955.*

Whether trust one for behoof of creditors—Jus quesitum tertio—Personal liability of trustee.

2. By trust-disposition A, a married woman, conveyed to B, as trustee, all her interest under the will of her deceased father, for the purposes (1) of realising the same and converting it into cash; (2) of paying all debts due by her at the date of the deed; and (3) of thereafter paying over the balance to her. In an action by C against A and B, in which it was established that a claim which C had intimated to B was due by A, held that B having represented that the trust in his person was a trust for creditors, and C having intimated her claim to him, he was not entitled to pay over the balance of the trust funds to A without satisfying C's claim, and consequently that he was personally liable to C. Cruickshank v. Thomas, Dec. 9, 1893, p. 257.

Liability of trustees—Goodwill of business carried on by trustee.

3. An engineer who had been many years in India, on his return to this country, continued to supply native and other traders in India with cotton presses, which he bought from makers in this country. At the time of his death his average income from this source was about £300 per annum. In an action of accounting brought some years after his death by the beneficiaries under his settlement against his trustees, after a proof, held that the goodwill was an asset of the deceased's estate which should have been sold by the trustees, and that they fell to be debited with £300 as the value thereof. Donald v. Hodgart's Trustees, Dec. 8, 1893, p. 246.

TRUST—Continued.

Sale of heritage by trustee without authority of the Court—Confirmation of sale—Nobile Officium—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, sec. 3.

4. A trustee acting under a trust-disposition and settlement which contained no power to sell heritage sold a part of the trust-estate without having first obtained the authority of the Court. The purchaser having objected to the title offered by the trustee, the latter presented a petition craving the Court "to approve, ratify, and confirm" the sale. The Court refused the petition. Clyne, June 5, 1894, p. 849.

Bona fide percepta et consumpta.

5. Testamentary annuity to widow less Government annuity and increase in latter after death of testator. Hunter's Trustees v. Hunter, July 6, 1894, p. 949.

Sale—Delivery—Possession—Marriage-contract—Conveyance to marriage-contract trustees retenta possessione.

6. In December 1883 M's estates were sequestrated, but before a trustee had been appointed a deed of arrangement was executed between M and his creditors and B. By this deed M assigned his furniture to B in consideration of payment of a sum exceeding its value by way of composition to the creditors. B thereafter assigned the furniture to the trustees under M's antenuptial marriage-contract for behoof of M's wife in liferent, and of the children of the marriage in fee, M's jus mariti being excluded. The furniture was allowed to remain in the house then occupied by M and his wife, which belonged to the trustees, and on the spouses removing to another house in 1884 the furniture was taken with them. In 1890 M sold the furniture to G, and G let the furniture on hire to M. The furniture remained with M and his wife. In an action by the marriage-contract trustees to have G interdicted from removing the furniture, held that the right to the furniture was in the trustees, in respect that since the date of the assignation in their favour M's wife had been in actual possession of it as liferentrix, and that the trustees had accordingly been in civil possession through her, and that G therefore had no title to it, and interdict granted. Mitchell's Trustees v. Gladstone, Feb. 27, 1894, p. 586.

Nobile Officium—Advances out of income directed to be accumulated.

7. In a petition for advances to be made for the maintenance and education of the minor children of a truster out of income directed by him to be accumulated, the Court, in respect that the main purpose of the truster had been effected by the accumulation of a sum of £10,000, and that advances were desirable in the interests of the children, granted the petition, and authorised the trustees to advance £200 a-year for each of the petitioners. Colquhoun, March 15, 1894, p. 671.

Advances out of income for maintenance of beneficiaries—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, sec. 7.

8. Testamentary trustees held the residue of a trust-estate for behoof of the testator's children, who were all minors, subject to a direction to divide it among the children or the survivors, when the youngest child should reach twenty-one years of age. The settlement contained a declaration that the provisions to the children should not become vested interests in them until the period of division, and there was no direction as to the application of the accruing income. There was no destination over in the event of the children all dying before the date of division. A petition was presented by the trustees for authority to apply the whole of the income, or such part thereof as they should think proper, for behoof of the children, on the ground that this was necessary for their maintenance and education. Held that the petition might be granted under sec. 7 of the Trusts Act, 1867, in respect (1) that the unappropriated income formed part of the capital; (2) that although the interest of each child was contingent, and had not vested, the children as a class had a vested interest in the sense of the statute; (3) that no persons had an interest in the residue other than the children and their heirs or representatives, as in the event of all the children dying before the provisions vested, the residue would fall to be dealt with as intestate succession of the testator, and would be payable to the representatives of the children, his next of kin. Ross's Trustees, July 14, 1894, p. 995.

Resignation of trustees—Implied power to resign in trust-deed—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867.

9. A trust-disposition and settlement, which conferred no express power on the trustees to resign, contained a clause, declaring that upon any of the trustees resigning office and accounting for their intromissions, the remaining trustees should be bound to discharge them of their office. Held that the trustees had power to resign under the deed, and a petition for authority to resign refused as unnecessary. Bunten v. Muir, Jan. 13, 1894, p. 370.

Removal of Trustee—Judicial Factor.

10. In a petition for removal of a trustee, and appointment of a judicial factor on the trust-estate, the petitioner averred that the trustee had paid out of the trust funds a claim on the trust-estate, without satisfying himself that it was properly vouched. It was not averred that in doing so he had acted in bad faith. The Court refused the prayer of the petition, on the ground that no malversation of office had been averred. Harris v. Howie's Trustee, Oct. 20, 1893, p. 16.

Process—Multiplepoinding—Double distress—Fund in medio.

11. Where there were competing claimants to one half of a trust-estate, the right to the other half not being in dispute, one of the claimants raised an action of multiplepoinding in name of the trustee, bringing the whole estate into Court as the fund in medio. Held that the action was incompetent. Macnab v. Waddell, May 30, 1894, p. 827.

Precatory bequests—Bequest to A "for the benefit of herself and of B."

12. Held that under a bequest "to A for the benefit of herself and of her sister B," each sister had a vested beneficial right in fee to one-half of the bequest, but that A was bound to retain B's share during their joint lives as trustee for her. Macpherson v. Macpherson's Curator Bonis, Jan. 17, 1894, p. 386.

Charitable trust—Uncertainty.

13. Held that a direction to trustees to pay and apply the residue of the testator's estate "to such useful, benevolent, and charitable institutions" as the trustees in their discretion might think proper, was not void from uncertainty. Cobb v. Cobb's Trustees, March 9, 1894, p. 638.

Charitable trust.

Charitable trust—Trade incorporation—Widows' fund—Illegal resolution—Exclusion of new members.

15. Held (1) that the power possessed by a trade incorporation prior to the passing of the Act 9 and 10 Vict. cap. 17, of admitting persons to the privilege of trading were held by them in trust for public purposes, and that the incorporation could not have refused admission to the trade of persons properly qualified; (2) that a relative benefit scheme was a similar trust, and that the incorporation were not entitled, for the purpose of enlarging the benefits of present members, to impose restrictions on the entry of new members; and (3) that a resolution passed for that purpose was illegal. Sadler v. Webster; Webster v. Incorporation of Tailors of Ayr, Nov. 14, 1893, p. 107.

VALUATION ACTS. Railways and Canals—Whether “company” includes commissioners—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854, sec. 21.

Principle of Valuation—Paper mill—Valuation by floor area.

2. An assessor valued the buildings of a paper mill at a uniform rate per square yard of floor space. Held in an appeal by the proprietor, that, as he did not propose to give information as to the profits of his business, but merely stated the alternative of valuation by cost of construction, the Assessor's valuation was right. Cowan & Sons, Limited, v. Assessor for Midlothian, May 25, 1894, p. 812.

Harbour—Apportionment of value between two parishes—Quayage.

3. In apportioning the cumulo valuation of a harbour between two parishes within which it was situated, the Assessor did so according to the lengths of quayage in the two parishes respectively. One of the parishes maintained that it should be first credited with revenue derived from certain fixed machinery locally situated within its bounds, and that only the revenue should be apportioned according to the quayage. Held that the harbour fell to be regarded as a unum quid, and that the allocation by quayage was right. Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Assessor for Ayr, May 25, 1894, p. 807.

Deductions—Harbour—Tenants' profits.

4. The trustees of Ayr Harbour were by statute empowered to administer the harbour, and to levy rates upon vessels and cargoes using the harbour, and were bound to apply the revenue derived from the rates, 1st, in payment of costs of management and maintenance, 2d, in payment of interest on borrowed money, 3d, in prescribed payments to a sinking fund, 4th, the surplus, if any, in paying off borrowed money, or in improving or otherwise for the benefit of the undertaking. The Assessor, in estimating the annual value of the harbour for the Valuation-roll, deducted from the gross revenue derived from the harbour-rates the charges and expenses necessary to earn that revenue, including interest on moveable plant and floating capital, together with the expenses of collection and management. The trustees maintained that they were entitled to a further deduction in name of tenants' profits. Held that as the whole surplus revenue was devoted by statute to other purposes, there could be no tenants' profits. Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Assessor for Ayr, May 25, 1894, p. 807.

Mansion-house and garden—Rent—Deductions—Services.

5. In a lease of a mansion-house, garden, and grounds to a yearly tenant at a cumulo rent, it was provided that the tenant should have the use of the furniture in the house and the garden produce, but the wages of the gardeners and the expense of keeping up the garden were to be paid by the proprietor. The Assessor having entered the subjects at the value at which they had stood in the Valuation-roll for fifteen years, while unlet and in the occupation of the proprietor, the proprietor appealed and maintained that the house, garden, &c., having been actually let, the rent ought to be taken as the basis of valuation, under deduction of the annual cost of the services provided by him. The Valuation Committee sustained the Assessor's valuation. In an appeal held that it was admitted that the services of the gardeners supplied by the proprietor were required for other parts of the estate as well as for the garden and grounds let to the tenant, and as it was impossible to ascertain precisely to what extent they were given to the let and to the unlet parts of the estate, the Valuation Committee were justified in the circumstances in adhering to the former valuation, and the Assessor's valuation affirmed. Colville's Trustees v. Assessor for Fife, May 25, 1894, p. 799.

Consideration other than rent—Minerals—Sum paid for right to bring down surface.

6. The proprietor of a colliery who had acquired from the proprietor of the surface the right to bring down the surface in consideration of an annual payment on the output, assigned this right to the tenant of the mine, who undertook in future to relieve him of the payment. Held that the annual payment thus made by the tenant constituted a consideration other than rent, and fell to be added to the lordships received by the proprietor from the tenant in estimating the annual value to be entered in the Valuation-roll, and there being nothing to shew how much of the payment represented surface damages, for which the tenant would have been liable, no deduction could be made on that account. Harvie v. Assessor for Upper Ward of Lanarkshire, May 25, 1894, p. 803.

Subjects of valuation—Steam-engine—Fixtures—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854, sec. 42.

7. Steam-engines which were held to be heritable fixtures in the sense of the Act of 1854, falling to be valued as part of the lands and heritages. Cowan & Sons, Limited, v. Assessor for Midlothian, May 25, 1894, p. 812.

Remit to obtain further information—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1879, sec. 9.

8. Circumstances in which in a valuation appeal the Court, on the motion of the appellant, in terms of the 9th section of the Valuation Act, 1879, remitted the case to the Valuation Committee to take further evidence, although the appellant had declined to avail himself of an opportunity of leading the evidence when the case was before the Commissioners. *Ramsden v. Bill of Exchange—Denial of Signature—Suspension—Caution.

2. A person who had been charged upon a bill bearing his name as acceptor presented a note of suspension of the charge on the ground that he had not adhibited or authorised the signature. Circumstances in which the Court passed the note without caution. Kechans v. Barr, Nov. 14, 1893, p. 75.
